Jacotot (zhä-kō-tō′), Jean Joseph. Born at Dijon, France, March 4, 1770: died at Paris, July, 1840. A French educator, professor of the French language and literature at Louvain 1818–40. He devised a method of instruction which is described in his "L'Enseignement universel" (1823).

His method of teaching is based on three principles: 1. All men have an equal intelligence; 2. Every man has received from God the faculty of being able to instruct himself; 3. Every thing is in every thing. The first of these principles is certainly wrong, although Jacotot tried to explain it by asserting that, although men had the same intelligence, they differed widely in the will to make use of it. Still, it is important to assert that nearly all men are capable of receiving some intellectual education, provided the studies to which they are directed are wide enough to engage their faculties, and the means taken to interest them are sufficiently ingenious. The second principle lays down that it is more necessary to stimulate the pupil to learn for himself than to teach him didactically. The third principle explains the process which Jacotot adopted. To one learning a language for the first time he would give a short passage of a few lines, and encourage the pupil to study first the words, then the letters, then the grammar, then the full meaning of the expressions, until by iteration and accretion a single paragraph took the place of an entire literature. Encyc. Brit., VII. 677.

Jambudvipa (jam-bō-dwē′pä). A name of India in Sanskrit poetry, and restricted to India in Buddhist writings, but strictly a poetical name for the whole earth, of which India was thought to be the most important part. In the Mahabharata the world is divided into seven circular dvipas, or continents, of which Jambudvipa is the first, surrounded respectively by seven oceans in concentric belts, the mountain Meru, or abode of the gods, being in the center of Jambudvipa, which again is divided into nine Varshas, or countries separated by eight ranges of mountains, the Varsha called Bharata (India) lying south of the Himavat (Himalaya) range. Jambudvipa is so named from the jambu (rose-apple) trees which abound in it, or from an enormous jambu tree on Mount Meru.

James (jāmz). [The E. name James, dial. also Jeames (whence colloq. Jem and Jim), is from ME. James, also Jam, from OF. James, another form of Jaques, Jacques, from LL. Jacobus, Jacob. See Jacob.] There are several persons of this name who hold an important place in New Testament history. (1) The son of Zebedee and brother of the apostle John. Originally a fisherman, he was called to be a disciple of Jesus and an apostle. He was killed by Herod Agrippa (A. D. 44), and is the only apostle whose death is recorded in the Scriptures. According to one legend, he traveled and preached in Spain; according to another, his body was miraculously conveyed to Compostella, in Spain, and worshiped there. (2) "James the Lord's brother," author of the "Epistle of James." He is described as holding office in the church at Jerusalem, and appears to have been president of the council that met there in A. D. 50 or 51. He is also called "James the less" (or "the little") (Mark xv. 40), and in early church history "James the Just." (3) An apostle, distinguished as "James the son of Alphæus," identified by many with "James the Lord's brother."

James, The General Epistle of. A New Testament epistle, written by "James the Lord's brother." It was written from Jerusalem, and is addressed to the twelve tribes of the Dispersion. Its main object is to inculcate the importance of practical morality.

James I. Born at Dunfermline, 1394: died Feb. 20, 1437. King of Scotland 1406–37, son of Robert III. and Annabella Drummond. He was captured by the English while on his way to France, and was detained in captivity until 1423. He repressed the great feudatories with the assistance of the clergy and the burghs, and maintained peaceful relations both with England and with France. He was murdered at Perth by the Earl of Atholl and Robert Graham.

James II. Born Oct. 16, 1430: died Aug. 3, 1460. King of Scotland 1437–60, son of James I. and Jane, daughter of the Earl of Somerset. He continued his father's policy of repressing the great feudatories with the assistance of the clergy and the burghs; and on Feb. 22, 1452, stabbed with his own hand the Earl of Douglas, who had entered into a treasonable alliance with the Earls of Crawford and of Ross, and whom he had enticed to Stirling by a safe-conduct. He was accidentally killed by a wedge from a bombard at the siege of Roxburgh.

James III. Born July 10, 1451: died June 11, 1488. King of Scotland 1460–88, son of James II. and Mary of Guelders. He favored men of inferior rank to the neglect of the great feudal houses, which provoked a rising of the latter under his son James. He was defeated by the rebels at Sauchieburn, June 11, 1488, and was killed in the flight.

James IV. Born March 17, 1473: died Sept. 9, 1513. King of Scotland 1488–1513, son of James III. and Margaret, daughter of Christian I. of Denmark. He headed the rebellious nobles who defeated and killed his father at the battle of Sauchieburn, June 11, 1488. He maintained peaceful relations with Henry VII. of England, whose daughter Margaret he married in 1502; but was forced by the aggressive attitude of Henry VIII. to seek an offensive alliance with France. He was defeated and killed by the Earl of Surrey at Flodden Field, Sept. 9, 1513, during an invasion of England in Henry's absence in France.

James V. Born at Linlithgow, April 10, 1512: died Dec. 14, 1542. King of Scotland 1513–42, son of James IV. and Margaret, daughter of Henry VII. of England. During his minority the regency was conducted first by his mother, and afterward by the Duke of Albany. He assumed personal exercise of the royal prerogatives in 1528. He was a vigorous administrator, protected the poor against oppression from the nobles, and mingled freely with the commons (sometimes under the incognito of "the Gudeman of Ballinbreich"), whence he is often called "the king of the commons." He became involved in war with England in 1542, and suffered the loss of an army under Sinclair at Solway Moss, Nov. 24, 1542.

James I. Born in Edinburgh Castle, June 19, 1566: died at Theobalds, March 27, 1625. King of England, Scotland, and Ireland 1603–25, son of Lord Darnley and Mary Queen of Scots. He became, on the abdication of his mother, king of Scotland as James VI. July 24, 1567; and by virtue of his descent, both through his father and his mother, from Margaret Tudor, daughter of Henry VII., succeeded to the English throne on the death of Elizabeth without issue, March 24, 1603, being crowned king of England (and Ireland) July 25, 1603. He was a learned but pedantic, weak, and incapable monarch, whence he was aptly characterized by the Duc de Sully as the "wisest fool in Europe." In domestic politics he sought to assert the theory of the divine right of kingship and of episcopacy; in his foreign relations he strove to maintain peace at all hazards, even to the prejudice of his natural allies, the Protestant powers on the Continent. He presided, in 1604, over the Hampton Court Conference between the bishops and the Puritans, at which the latter sought but failed to obtain a relaxation of the laws directed against nonconformists. In the same year he concluded peace with Spain, with which he had inherited a war from his predecessor in England; and appointed a commission to revise the English translation of the Bible, which commission completed the so-called King James version in 1611. He sanctioned in 1606 penal laws of increased severity against the Roman Catholics in consequence of the discovery of the Gunpowder Plot (which see) in the preceding year, and granted a patent organizing the London and Plymouth companies, the former of which founded the settlement of Jamestown in 1607, while a band of English separatists from Holland founded, without authority, the settlement of Plymouth in the territory of the latter in 1620. Another important event which took place in 1606 was the restoration of episcopacy in Scotland. He began in 1611 negotiations for the marriage of his eldest son Charles with a Spanish princess; and in the same year entered into a defensive alliance with the Protestant Union in Germany, which was followed in 1613 by the marriage of his daughter Elizabeth to the elector palatine Frederick V., head of the union. He refused to assist his son-in-law in the struggle with the emperor Ferdinand II. for the crown of Bohemia (see Frederick V., elector palatine, Ferdinand II., emperor of the Holy Roman Empire, and Thirty Years' War); and after the defeat of Frederick by the Imperialists on the White Hill, and the invasion of the Palatinate by the Spanish troops in 1620, sought by futile negotiations to induce Philip III. of Spain to reinstate Frederick in the electorate and to assist in restoring peace. In answer to a rebuke from the king for meddling in affairs of state by sending in a petition against popery and the proposed Spanish marriage, Parliament passed, Dec. 18, 1621, the Great Protestation, declaring that affairs which concerned the king and the realm were proper subjects for debate in Parliament. The king tore the page containing the protestation from the journal of the Commons. In 1623 he reluctantly permitted Charles and the Duke of Buckingham to depart for Spain to conclude the negotiations for a marriage treaty which had been kept up, with interruptions, since 1611; but as Philip was unwilling to procure the restoration of the Palatinate, Charles and the duke returned in the same year, and the negotiations were finally abandoned.

James II. Born at St. James's Palace, Oct. 14, 1633: died at St. Germain, Sept. 6, 1701. King of England, Scotland, and Ireland 1685–88, son of Charles I. and Henrietta Maria. Before his accession he was known as the Duke of York. He became lord high admiral of England on the accession of his brother Charles II. in 1660; received a grant of the New Netherlands in 1664; embraced the Roman Catholic faith probably before 1672; and was forced by the Test Act to resign the admiralty in 1673. Under the guidance of Father Petre, his confessor and chief adviser, he aimed on his accession to make himself an absolute monarch and to restore the Roman Catholic Church. He increased the standing army from 6,000 to about 30,000 men by keeping up the military force raised to suppress the Scottish rebellion under the Duke of Monmouth in 1685, and granted commissions in the new regiments to Roman Catholics. He published a declaration of liberty of conscience for all denominations in England and Scotland early in 1687, and April 25, 1688, ordered the declaration to be read in all the churches. A petition from the primate and six bishops against the order was pronounced a seditious libel by the king, who sent the seven bishops to the Tower and brought them to trial before the Court of King's Bench. The trial resulted in acquittal June 30, 1688, and the same day an invitation, signed by the Earls of Danby, Devonshire, and Shrewsbury, the Bishop of London, and others, was despatched to William of Orange to save England from a Roman Catholic tyranny. William landed at Torbay Nov. 5, 1688, and Dec. 22 James escaped to France, where he was assigned the château of St. Germain by Louis XIV. as a place of refuge. In 1689 he made a descent on Ireland, but was totally defeated by William at the battle of the Boyne, July 1, 1690.

Japan (ja-pan′). [Corrupted from Zipangu (of Marco Polo), corrupted from native Niphon or Nippon, Land of the Rising Sun; F. Japon, Sp. Japon, G. and D. Japan, Pg. Japão.] An empire of Asia, lying in the Pacific east of China, Korea, and Siberia. Capital, Tokio. It comprises four principal islands—the main island (Hondu), Yezo, Shikoku, and Kiushiu, with about 4,000 small islands, including the Loochoo and Kurile groups. The surface is mountainous and hilly, culminating in Fuji-san (12,365 feet). The leading occupation is agriculture. The chief exports are silk, tea, rice, coal, copper, fish, lacquer, etc. The administrative divisions are 3 fu and 43 ken (or prefectures). There is also a subdivision politically into 85 provinces. The government is a limited monarchy, with an emperor, cabinet and privy council, and an Imperial Parliament composed of a House of Peers and a House of Representatives. The prevailing religions are Shintoism and Buddhism. Authentic history begins about 500 A. D. Korean influence began at an early date, and Buddhism was introduced from Korea about 550. The shogun Yoritomo usurped the authority in 1192. Marco Polo visited the islands in the 13th century. A system of feudal baronage grew up: the Mikados were the emperors, but the real power belonged to the shoguns. The Portuguese traded with Japan from 1543 till their exclusion in 1638, and the native Christians were persecuted from 1624. The Tokugawa dynasty of shoguns began in 1603. Japan continued isolated, except for restricted trade with the Dutch, till the American expedition under Perry, 1853: he forced a commercial treaty, March 31, 1854, which was followed by commercial relations with other countries. The shogunate was abolished in 1867, and a civil war ended in 1868 in the recovery of full power by the Mikado. More recent events are abolition of the feudal system, 1871; annexation of the Bonin Islands, 1876, and of the Loochoo Islands, 1879; suppression of the Satsuma rebellion, 1877; constitution promulgated, 1889; first parliament met, 1890; war with China and acquisition of Formosa, 1894–95 (see China); and war with Russia, Feb., 1904–Sept., 1905. (See Russo-Japanese War). Area (exclusive of Formosa and the Pescadores), 147,655 square miles. Population (1903), 46,305,000.

Japheth (jā′feth), or Japhet (jā′fet). According to the account in Genesis, the third son of Noah, and the ancestor of various nations in northern Asia and in Europe (in general, of the so-called Indo-European race). See Shem.

Attempts have been made to explain the names of the three sons of Noah as referring to the colour of the skin. Japhet has been compared with the Assyrian ippatu, 'white'; Shem with the Assyrian samu, 'olive-coloured'; while in Ham etymologists have seen the Hebrew khâm, 'to be hot.' But all such attempts are of very doubtful value.

He was born at Iolcus, was a son of Æson and Polymede, and was brought up under the instruction of Chiron. The legends concerning him are numerous and varied. His greatest exploit was the expedition to Colchis with the other Argonauts to obtain the Golden Fleece. This he secured by the aid of the sorceress Medea, daughter of Æetes, king of Colchis, who fell in love with him. She protected him from the bulls breathing fire and hoofed with brass which he was obliged, in order to obtain the fleece, to yoke to the plow, and from the armed men who sprang up from the dragon's teeth which he was required to sow in the fields. From other perils, also, she saved him, and fled with him and the fleece. Jason finally deserted Medea. See Medea.

Jataka (jä'ta-ka). [Skt. jātaka, nom. jātakam, nativity, principles of nativity.] Among the Buddhists, a former birth of Shakyamuni, and a narrative regarding it; "Birth-story." The Jatakas are one of the sacred books of the Buddhists, a division of the Khuddakanikaya, or "collection of short treatises," in the Suttapitaka, or discourses for the laity. There is evidence of the existence of a collection so named as early as the Council of Vesali (about 380 B. C.). They were put into their present form in the Suttapitaka in the 5th century A. D. There were current among the Buddhists fables and parables ascribed to Buddha, the sanctity of which they sought to increase by identifying the best character in any story with Buddha himself in a former birth. Distinguished by quaint humor and gentle earnestness, they teach the duty of tender sympathy with animals. Many, if not all, of the fables of the Hitopadesha may be identified with them. The stories number 550. They have been edited in the original Pali by Fausböll, and are being translated by Rhys Davids and under his superintendence. Rhys Davids terms them "the most important collection of ancient folk-lore extant."

Jenner (jen'ėr), Edward. Born at Berkeley, Gloucestershire, May 17, 1749: died there, Jan. 26, 1823. An English physician, famous as the discoverer of vaccination. In 1770 he became a pupil of John Hunter in London, and also studied at the same time in St. George's Hospital. In 1773 he began to practise in Berkeley. His investigation of cowpox began very early, and was suggested by the local rustic tradition that the dairymaids who contracted the disease were exempt from smallpox. On May 14, 1796, he vaccinated a boy of eight with lymph from the hand of a dairymaid, and on July 1 inoculated the same boy with smallpox. The experiment was successful: an account of it was published June, 1798. The practice of vaccination gradually gained ground until in 1800 a great part of his time was taken up by the distribution of lymph, much of it in America. Honors came to him from every quarter, and on June 2, 1802, a grant of £10,000 was made to him by Parliament.

Jervis (jėr′vis), John, Earl St. Vincent. Born at Meaford, Jan. 9, 1735: died March 14, 1823. An English admiral. He entered the royal navy as able seaman Jan. 4, 1749. Sept. 24, 1787, he was promoted rear-admiral, and in 1790 was returned to Parliament for Wycombe. Feb. 1, 1793, he became vice-admiral, and on July 1, 1795, was made admiral. On Nov. 29, 1795, he joined the fleet on the coast of Corsica as commander-in-chief. Sept. 25, 1796, he was ordered to abandon Corsica and the Mediterranean and to defend the Channel. To prevent the union of the allied fleet with the French squadron at Brest, he took up a position off Cape St. Vincent Feb., 1797. On Feb. 14 a battle was fought, resulting in the capture of four Spanish ships. He was at once gazetted to an earldom with the title of St. Vincent. He relinquished his command June 15, 1799. In the summer of 1800 he again entered the service in command of the Channel fleet. In 1801 he became first lord of the admiralty. On the collapse of the Addington ministry and the return of Pitt to power, St. Vincent's retirement from the admiralty became necessary. After the death of Pitt he again entered the service with the acting rank of admiral of the fleet, March, 1806, but was relieved April 24, 1807.

Jesuits (jez′ū-its). [So called (first, it is said, by Calvin, about 1550) from the name given to the order by its founder (NL. Societas Jesu, the Company (or Society) of Jesus).] The members of the "Society of Jesus" (or "Company of Jesus"), founded by Ignatius Loyola in 1534, and confirmed by the Pope in 1540. Its membership includes two general classes (laymen, or temporal coadjutors, and priests) and six grades—namely, novices, formed temporal coadjutors, approved scholastics, formed spiritual coadjutors, the professed of three vows, and the professed of four vows. The professed of the four vows are the most influential class: they form the general congregation, and fill the highest offices and the leading missions. The general is elected for life by the general congregation. They were expelled from France in 1594; restored in 1603; again expelled in 1764, and for the last time in 1880. They were expelled from Spain in 1767, and at different times from various other countries. In 1773 the order was suppressed by Pope Clement XIV., but it was revived in 1814.

Jesus (jē′zus). [Gr. Ἰησοῦς, Saviour, from Heb. Jehoshua or Joshua, Jehovah is salvation: used in Acts vii. 45, Heb. iv. 8 for Joshua.] The personal name of the founder of Christianity, often joined with the official name Christ, the Anointed One (Jesus Christ or Christ Jesus). He is the central figure in the Christian religion, belief in whom as the Son of God and the Saviour of men is its distinctive characteristic. His personality has been the subject of much controversy. The Trinitarian doctrine that there is but one God and yet three equal subjects or "persons" in one Godhead is that now accepted generally throughout Christendom, the essence of the Father and Son being regarded as the same, as was maintained in the early church by the Homoöusians in opposition to the Homoiousians, who held that their natures are only similar, and the Heteroousians, who held that they are different. According to the narratives of the four gospels, Jesus was born of Mary, a virgin of the tribe of Judah and family of David, in a stable at Bethlehem; was brought up as a carpenter in the workshop of his reputed father; entered, when about 30 years of age, on a public ministry; traveled for two or three years through Judea and Galilee, teaching and working numerous miracles, especially of healing, accompanied more or less by twelve men whom he had chosen as his disciples; was thereafter seized by the Jews, subjected to an irregular trial on a charge of blasphemy, handed over by the Jews to Pilate, the Roman governor, and ultimately sent by him to crucifixion; died on the cross, was buried, and on the morning of the third day rose again from the dead; was afterward seen of many witnesses; and forty days later ascended into Heaven. The birth of Jesus is now generally believed to have taken place about four years before the period from which we reckon our years in the vulgar or Christian era.

Jewel (jō′el), John. Born May 24, 1522: died at Monkton Farleigh, Sept. 23, 1571. Bishop of Salisbury. He graduated at Oxford (Merton College) in 1540, and was elected fellow of Corpus Christi in 1542. On the accession of Mary in 1553, Jewel was deprived of his fellowship, and fled to Frankfort March 13, 1555. On Mary's death he returned to England. His letters to Peter Martyr and other friends at this time are a valuable source of historical information. He was appointed a disputant at the Westminster Conference in 1559, preacher at Paul's Cross in June, 1560, and bishop of Salisbury in July, 1560. In 1562 appeared his "Apologia pro Ecclesia Anglicana," the first methodical statement of the Church of England's position against the Church of Rome. Jewel's complete works were collected under the direction of Archbishop Bancroft and published in 1609.

Jew of Malta, The. A play by Marlowe. It was written after 1588, and was frequently acted between 1591 and 1596. It was revived in 1601 and 1633, and in 1818 Kean produced an altered version at Drury Lane. The earliest English edition extant is dated 1633, and was edited, somewhat altered, by T. Heywood. It presents the popular idea of an avaricious, murderous Jew.

There was an older play of "The Jew," named by Stephen Gosson in his "School of Abuse" as setting forth "the greediness of worldly choosers and the bloody minds of usurers," which seems to have been a treatment in one play of the two fables which form the groundwork of Shakespeare's "Merchant of Venice." Some years after the death of Marlowe we find evidence in Germany of the existence of a play in which Barabas of "The Jew of Malta" is made one with the Jew of the other play. It has, therefore, some rough features of resemblance to "The Merchant of Venice," and in the course of this piece it is to be observed that Barabas changes his name to Joseph.

Ἰωάννης, Heb. Yehohhanān (in Eng. O. T. Johanan), 'the Lord graciously gave.' The form Jack, often used as a familiar substitute for John, is really a short form of Jacob.] One of the three disciples of Jesus who were admitted to closest intimacy with him, preëminently "the disciple whom Jesus loved." He was the son of Zebedee, and originally a fisherman. His brother James and he were designated "Boanerges," sons of thunder. He leaned on the bosom of Jesus at the last supper, and was present at the crucifixion, when Jesus committed his mother to John's special care. He is generally believed to have been the author of the gospel and the three epistles that bear his name, and also of the Apocalypse or Revelation, though the question of the authorship of all these has more or less been matter of discussion. Early ecclesiastical traditions tell that, after an enforced or voluntary exile to the isle of Patmos, he returned to Ephesus, and died there at a great age.

John, The Gospel of. The fourth gospel, the authorship of which is generally attributed to the apostle John. It has very much less in common with the other three gospels than they have with each other. Its main purpose is set forth in the book itself: "These are written that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that, believing, ye might have life through his name" (xx. 31). While it is largely narrative, the discourses and sayings of Jesus have prominence (see especially xiv.–xvii.). The date usually assigned to it is from 80 to 90 A. D.

John, the Baptist. Born about 5 (?) B. C.: beheaded about 30 A. D. The forerunner of Jesus, and the last of the Hebrew prophets.

John I., Saint. Pope 523–526. He was a native of Tuscany, and was elevated on the death of Hormisdas. In 525 he was sent by Theodoric, king of the East Goths, at the head of an embassy to the Byzantine emperor to obtain toleration for the Arians, in which he was only partially successful. He was suspected by Theodoric of having secretly opposed the object of the mission, and was on his return thrown into prison, where he died. He is commemorated in the Roman Catholic Church on May 27.

John II., surnamed Mercurius (on account of his eloquence). Pope 532–535.

John III. Pope 560–573. During his pontificate Italy was ravaged by frequent incursions of the Lombards.

John, surnamed Lackland. Born probably at Oxford, Dec. 24, 1167 (?): died at Newark, Oct. 19, 1216. King of England 1199–1216, son of Henry II. and Eleanor. He ascended the English throne on the death of his brother Richard I. without issue. His succession was recognized also in the duchy of Normandy, but the lords of Anjou, Maine, and Touraine declared, according to their custom of inheritance, in favor of Arthur as the son of an elder brother. Having put Arthur to death in 1203, his French fiefs were declared forfeited by Philip II. of France, who took Château Gaillard, the last of John's strongholds in France, March 6, 1204. On the death of Hubert Walter, archbishop of Canterbury, in 1205, a disputed election for the archbishopric was followed by a reference to Rome, which resulted in the election of Stephen Langton by the command of Pope Innocent III. in 1206. John refused to recognize the new archbishop, and England was laid under an interdict in 1208. In 1212 the Pope issued a bull deposing John and intrusting the execution of the deposition to Philip II. of France. John made his peace with the Pope by consenting to hold his kingdom in fief from the Pope and to pay an annual tribute of 1,000 marks (May 15, 1213). He thereupon invaded France in alliance with the emperor Otto IV., the Flemish, and others, but was defeated with his allies at Bouvines in 1214. In the mean time the barons, with whom he had been embroiled ever since his accession by his exactions and misgovernment, had combined to secure a reform in the government, and on his return John was compelled to sign the Magna Charta (which see) at Runnymede, June 15, 1215. He appealed to the Pope, who declared the charter void. The barons retorted by declaring the crown forfeited and bestowing it upon Louis, son of Philip II. of France, who landed in England in 1216. John died during the ensuing war, and his opportune death preserved the crown for his son Henry III.

John (F. Jean) II., surnamed "Le Bon" ('the Good'). Died at London, April 8, 1364. King of France 1350–64, son of Philip VI. He was defeated and captured by the British under the Black Prince at Poitiers in 1356, and was restored to liberty by the peace of Brétigny in 1360.

John of Gamundia. See the extract.

John of Gamundia was a mathematician and professor of astronomy. At his death, in the year 1442, he was chancellor of the University of Vienna. The calendars made by him were highly esteemed, and were engraved and printed for many years after his death. In his researches after old prints, the late R. Z. Becker, of Gotha, discovered one of the original blocks of a placard or poster edition of the Calendar of John of Gamundia. He describes it as about 10⅜ inches wide, 15½ inches long, and 1½ inches thick. The block was engraved on both sides.

John of Gaunt (corrupted from Ghent), Duke of Lancaster. Born at Ghent, March, 1340: died at London, Feb. 3, 1399. The fourth son of Edward III. In 1342 he was created earl of Richmond, and in 1359 married his cousin Blanche, second daughter of Henry, duke of Lancaster. On the death of Henry (May, 1361) and his eldest daughter Maud, duchess of Bavaria, he succeeded by right of his wife to the rank and possessions of the dukes of Lancaster. In 1367 he accompanied the Black Prince on the Spanish expedition. Blanche died in 1369, and in 1371 he married Constance, eldest daughter of Pedro the Cruel, the deposed king of Castile. Returning to England in 1372, he styled himself King of Castile by right of his wife. Lancaster was constantly engaged in the struggle with France, but although a brave knight he was never a competent general, and his repeated failures contributed much to his increasing unpopularity. The Black Prince died June 8, 1376, and the Good Parliament, which under his patronage had undertaken to reform abuses, was dissolved. On July 6 the supreme power passed into the hands of Lancaster. His most powerful opponent, William of Wykeham, was disgraced. In the struggle with the clerical party Lancaster was drawn into an alliance with the Reformers, especially Wyclif whom he defended before the convocation at St. Paul's, Feb. 19, 1377. His brutal behavior excited a riot in London: his palace, the Savoy, was attacked, and he was forced to take refuge with Prince Richard and his mother, the widow of the Black Prince, at Kennington. Edward III. died June 21, 1377, and Richard II. became king, and Lancaster's political power declined. He was engaged in futile expeditions to France and Scotland. While absent in the north his extreme unpopularity was shown by the destruction of his palace of the Savoy in Wat Tyler's insurrection, June 13, 1381. Richard II. created him duke of Aquitaine March 2, 1390, and he assisted in negotiating the French treaty May 24, 1394.

Johnson, Samuel. Born at Lichfield, England, Sept. 18, 1709: died at London, Dec. 13, 1784. A celebrated English lexicographer, essayist, and poet. He was the son of Michael Johnson, book- seller at Lichfield, a High-churchman and Jacobite. He lost the use of one eye from scrofula, and was "touched" by Queen Anne. His uncouth appearance and manner were against him through life. In 1728 he entered Pem- broke College, Oxford, and resided there continuously until Dec. 12, 1729, and afterward at intervals until Oct. 8, 1731. A Latin translation of Pope's "Messiah" (much admired by Pope) was written at this time. He began to suffer from violent attacks of the hypochondria which followed him through life. In 1732 he became usher at Market Bos- worth school, but soon abandoned the place and returned to Lichfield and Birmingham, in which latter town he mar- ried a Mrs. Porter, July 9, 1735. He established a school at Edial, near Lichfield, in 1736, which soon failed. Among his pupils was David Garrick, with whom he started for London, March 3, 1737. In March, 1738, a Latin ode to Sylvanus Urban appeared in Cave's "Gentleman's Maga- zine," to which he became a regular contributor. In May, 1738, "London," an imitation of Juvenal, was published by Dodsley. The "Life of Savage" appeared in Feb., 1744. The plan of his dictionary, inscribed to Lord Chesterfield, was issued in 1747. The booksellers agreed to pay £1,575 for the copyright, including the entire work of prepa- ration for the press. He employed 6 amanuenses, 5 of whom were Scotchmen. The book was based on an in- terleaved copy of Nathan Bailey's dictionary, and appeared in 2 volumes, folio, April 15, 1755. In Jan., 1749, he pub- lished the "Vanity of Human Wishes," the finest of his poems. His tragedy "Irene" (begun at Edial) was pro- duced Feb. 6, 1749, with indifferent success by Garrick at Drury Lane. The "Rambler" appeared every Tuesday and Saturday from March 20, 1750, until March 14, 1752, and, with the exception of Nos. 10, 30, 44, 97, and 100, was en- tirely his work (No. 97 was written by Richardson). His wife died March 17, 1752. On Feb. 20, 1755, he received the degree of M. A. from Oxford. His work "Rasselas" was written in the evenings of one week in 1759. Among his political tracts is "Taxation no Tyranny" (1775), in answer to the address of the American Congress. After the ac- cession of George III., Johnson received a pension of £300. During his last years he devoted himself almost exclusively to society and conversation, and his sayings and doings were carefully reported by Boswell and Mrs. Piozzi (Thrale). In 1773 he took his well-known journey with Boswell, an account of which was published in 1775 as "A Journey to the Western Isles of Scotland." He also wrote nearly all the numbers of "The Idler" (1758-60), and published an edition of Shakspere in 8 volumes, with notes, in 1765.

> Arphaxad was the grandfather of Eber or "Hebrew." "Unto Eber," we are told [in Genesis], "were born two sons: the name of one was Peleg; for in his days was the earth divided; and his brother's name was Joktan." The tribes and districts of south-eastern Arabia traced their descent to Joktan. Among them we find Hazarmaveth, the modern Hadhramaut; Ophir, the famous sea-port and emporium of the goods of the further east; Havilah, 'the sandy region,' compassed by the river Pison (Gen. ii. 11), and occupied by the sons of Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 18); and Amalek (1 Sam. xv. 7), as well as Sheba, the Saba of the native inscriptions, whose ancient capital is now represented by the ruins of Mareb in the south-western corner of Arabia. Sayce, Races of the O. Jonson (jon'son), Benjamin, usually known as Ben Jonson. Born at Westminster, 1573 (?): died Aug. 6, 1637. A celebrated English dramatist. His parentage is not certainly known. His mother married, while he was still a child, a master bricklayer said to have been named Fowler. He was sent to a school at St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, but was soon removed to Westminster school, where William Camden befriended him. After a somewhat obscure period he began to work for the stage: in 1597 he appeared in Henslowe's "Diary" as a player and a playwright to "The Admiral's Men." During a break with the Admiral's company his first extant comedy, "Every Man in his Humour," was offered to the rival company, the "Lord Chamberlain's Servants." It was accepted, and was performed at the Globe in 1598, Shakspere playing in it. Jonson ranked from this time with the foremost dramatists of the period. He became involved in quarrels with Dekker and Marston, and in the plays of the two latter are characters attacking or ridiculing him, while he in turn satirized them in several of his plays. In 1603 he began to write "Entertainments," and in 1605 the first of his series of "Court Masques." He was in favor with the court, and his life now entered its most successful phase. The plays performed during 1605–16 ("Epicœne," "The Alchemist," "Catiline," "Bartholomew Fair," and "The Devil is an Ass") are among his best. In 1613 he went to France as tutor to a son of Sir Walter Raleigh, and in 1618 he made his well-known pedestrian journey to Scotland. About this time he spent some weeks at the house of William Drummond of Hawthornden, whose notes of his talk are the principal source of his biography. On his return he wrote a narrative in verse of his adventures ("Underwoods, No. 62"). Between 1621 and 1623 the king raised Jonson's pension to £200, and the greatest calamity of his private life occurred—the burning of his library, which was one of the finest in England. In 1626 he was attacked with palsy, followed by dropsy, and was confined to his bed during his last years. He was appointed chronologer to the city of London in 1628, which increased his income; but his powers were failing and his next play, "The New Inn," was not heard to the end, and in 1631 his salary as chronologer was withdrawn. He brought out more plays and masks, and in 1634 his salary was restored. He lived three years longer, during which time he wrote little. "The Sad Shepherd," unfinished, was found among his papers. He was buried in Westminster Abbey, in the Poets' Corner. The political crisis at this time prevented the erection of an elaborate tomb which was intended, and a casual visitor, Sir John Young, caused "O rare Ben Jonson" to be cut on his tomb. Among his friends were all the people of culture of the time, notably Chapman and Fletcher. With Shakspere he was less intimate: but the theory of his jealousy of the latter has been completely refuted by Gifford. Among his plays are "Every Man in his Humour" (acted 1598, printed 1601), "The Case is Altered" (1509, printed 1609), "Every Man out of his Humour" (1599, printed 1600), "Cynthia's Revels" (1600), "The Poetaster, etc." (1601, printed 1602), "Sejanus, his Fall," with another (1603, printed 1605), "Eastward Ho," with Chapman and Marston (1604, printed 1605), "Volpone, or the Fox" (1605, printed 1607), "Epicœne, or the Silent Woman" (1609), "The Alchemist" (1610, printed 1612), "Catiline, his Conspiracy" (1611), "Bartholomew Fair" (1614, printed (folio) 1631), "The Devil is an Ass" (1616, folio 1631), "The Staple of News" (1625, folio 1631), "The New Inn, etc." (1629, printed 1631), "The Magnetick Lady" (licensed 1632, folio 1640), "A Tale of a Tub" (licensed 1633, folio 1640), "The Sad Shepherd, etc." (folio 1641), etc. Besides these, he wrote a number of "Masques," "Entertainments," and poems: among the latter are included "Epigrammes" (published 1616) and "The Forest," which contains his best songs, etc., up to 1616, most of which were subsequently published under the name of "Underwoods" (his own title) after his death (1640). The lines to the memory of Shakspere prefixed to the Shakspere folio (1623) were first included in Jonson's works by Gifford. He wrote several prose works, among which are "Timber, or Discoveries made upon Men and Matter," usually known as "Discoveries" (1641), and "The English Grammar made by Ben Jonson for the benefit of all strangers" (1640), etc. His works were first collected in a folio edition, of which the first volume, revised by himself, appeared in 1616, the second 1630–41. Whalley (1756) first edited him, and in 1816 Gifford brought out an edition, reprinted by Cunningham in 1875.

Joseph of Arimathea. A rich Israelite who apparently was a member of the Sanhedrim at the time of the crucifixion. He was afraid to confess his belief in Jesus Christ. After the crucifixion, however, he went and begged the body of Jesus, and buried it in his own tomb. There is a legend that he was imprisoned for 42 years, which seemed but 3 to him on account of the Holy Grail which he kept with him in prison; and that he carried the Grail, after his release by Vespasian, to Britain, where he built the abbey of Glastonbury. There is an alliterative English romance "Joseph of Arimathea," written about 1350 (edited by Professor Skeat in 1871). Robert de Borron composed two versions of a "Legend of Joseph of Arimathea, or The Little St. Grail," in verse and in prose, which fell into the hands of Walter Map, who wrote the "Great Saint Grail" from them.

Josephus (jō-sē'fus), Flavius (Jewish name Joseph ben Matthias). Born 37 A. D.: died about 95. A celebrated Jewish historian. He was of illustrious priestly descent, and related to the Maccabean house. A visit to Rome in his early years filled him with enthusiastic admiration for it and its institutions. At the outbreak of the Judeo-Roman war he was intrusted by the Sanhedrim with the governorship of Galilee, and as such took part in the war against Rome. But he weakened the province under his administration by sowing discord; and when the fortress Jotapata, after a most heroic resistance, was taken by Vespasian, he managed to save his own life after the remnant of the besieged had died by their own hands. Vespasian, glad to have him on his side as a guide and adviser, received him with courtesy and friendliness, and he remained with Vespasian and Titus, following them, after the fall of his people, to Rome, and living in the sunshine of their favor. He received large tracts of land in Judea and an annual pension, and adopted the name of Flavius after that of the imperial family. In Rome he wrote his work "The Jewish War," in 7 books, at first in the Syro-Chaldaic tongue and afterward in Greek. His "Antiquities of the Jews," a history of the Jewish people from the earliest times to 26 A. D., in 20 books, is a defense of the Jews against Apion, and his own autobiography. In his writings he displays a great love for his nation and religion. His works are not only the most comprehensive and important source of information for the history of his times, but also are distinguished for their excellent historical style, which gained for him the title of a Hebrew Livy. He died under Domitian, and, according to some intimations, as a martyr to the faith of his race.

Joshua (josh'ū-ä). [Heb. Yehoshua, whose help is Yahveh. See Jesus.] The successor of Moses as leader of the Israelites. He was the son of Nun, of the tribe of Ephraim, and was one of the two spies who reported favorably of Canaan. He was an attendant of Moses, who designated him as his successor. He led the nation into the land of promise, and was their captain in the wars that resulted in their peaceful occupation of it. The book that bears his name consists mainly of an account of the settlement of the Israelites in Canaan. It is of composite structure.

Josiah (jō-sī'ä). [Heb., 'Yahveh heals.'] King of Judah 640–609 B. C. (Duncker), son of Amon. He was defeated and slain by Pharaoh-Necho at the battle of Megiddo in the valley of Esdraelon. (2 Ki. xxii.–xxiv. 30, and 2 Chron. xxxiv.–xxxv.) He brought about important reforms, destroying all forms of idolatrous worship. It was under his reign that the priest Hilkiah found the book of the law. See Deuteronomy.

Jósika (yō'shē-ko), Baron Miklós. Born at Torda, Transylvania, April 28, 1796: died at Dresden, Feb. 27, 1865. A Hungarian historical novelist. Among his chief novels are "Abafi" (1836), "The Poet Zrinyi" (1840), "The Last Bátory" (1838), "The Bohemians in Hungary" (1840), "A Hungarian Family during the Revolution" (1851), "The Family Mailly" (1852), "Esther" (1853).

Josippon. The title of a history, in Hebrew, which originated in the 10th century in Italy, and which the author (under the pseudonym Joseph ben Gorion) claims to be a free translation of Josephus's historical works. The historical events are mingled with legends and tales which the author has drawn from the rabbinical literature, Hegesippus, the oldest compendium of the authentic Josephus, and the patristic writings. It was written in a kind of poetical prose, and was a great favorite with the Jewish people; it has been translated into many languages.

Josquin (zhos-kaṅ') or Josse Desprez (dā-prā'), or De Prés (dė prā), Latinized to Jodocus a Pratis (jō-dō'kus ā prā'tis), or a Prato, or Pratensis (prā-ten'sis). Born at or near St.-Quentin, Hainault, about 1450: died at Condé, Hainault, Aug. 27, 1521. A celebrated Flemish composer, "one of the greatest masters of the Netherland school," author of masses, numerous motets, etc.

Josse (zhos), Monsieur. A jeweler in Molière's "L'Amour médecin." When asked how to cure a love-sick lady he recommends jewelry at once; hence the sarcastic phrase "Vous êtes orfèvre, M. Josse" ("You are a jeweler, Mr. Josse")—that is, you advise others for your own benefit.

Josselin (zhos-laṅ'). A town in the department of Loire-Inférieure, France, on the Oust 23 miles northeast of Vannes. Jougne (zhōny), Col de. A pass over the Jura on the borders of Vaud, Switzerland, and the department of Doubs, France, connecting Lausanne with Pontarlier.

Joule (jōl), James Prescott. Born at Salford, Lancashire, England, Dec. 24, 1818: died at Sale, Cheshire, England, 1889. An English physicist, noted for his researches in the mechanical equivalent of heat. His paper on "Electro-Magnetic Forces" (1840) contains one of the earliest known attempts to measure a galvanic current by a definite unit. In a paper "On the Production of Heat by Voltaic Electricity" (1840) he first announced the law "that when a current of voltaic electricity is propagated along a metallic conductor, the heat evolved in any given time is proportional to the resistance of the conductor multiplied by the square of the electric intensity." This discovery was largely suggested by Ohm's "Die galvanische Kette" (1827). In a paper (1843) "On the Heat Evolved during the Electrolysis of Water," he demonstrated that the mechanical and heating powers of the voltaic current are proportional to each other. These discoveries were the result of a long series of experiments on the equivalence of heat and energy, which occupied the remainder of his life. In a paper "On the Calorific Effects of Magnetic Electricity and the Mechanical Value of Heat" (1843) it is stated that "the quantity of heat capable of increasing the temperature of a pound of water by one degree of Fahrenheit's scale is equal to . . . a mechanical force capable of raising 838 pounds to a perpendicular height of one foot." Joule made his final experiments in 1878, and the mechanical constant was determined to be 772.55 foot-pounds.

Jourdain (zhōr-daṅ'), Alfonse, Count de Toulouse. Born in Syria, 1103: died at Acre, Palestine, 1148. Ruler of the greater part of southern France 1125–48.

Of his works there survive more than 800 secular poems, and more than 300 religious poems. He was also the author of an apologetical work in Arabic, "The Book of Argumentation and Demonstration for the Defense of the Oppressed Religion," better known by the title of the Hebrew translation, "Chozari." According to a tradition he undertook a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, and was there trampled to death by a Saracen rider.

Judas (jö′das), surnamed "The Gaulonite," or "The Galilean." A Jewish popular leader in the revolt against the census under the prefect Quirinus.

The sect of Judas the Gaulonite, or, as he was called, the Galilean, may be considered the lineal inheritors of that mingled spirit of national independence and of religious enthusiasm which had in early days won the glorious triumph of freedom from the Syro-Grecian kings, and had maintained a stern though secret resistance to the later Asmoneans, and to the Idumean dynasty. Just before the death of Herod, it had induced the six thousand Pharisees to refuse the oath of allegiance to the king and to his imperial protector, and had probably been the secret incitement in the other acts of resistance to the royal authority. Judas the Galilean openly proclaimed the unlawfulness, the impiety, of God's people submitting to a foreign yoke, and thus acknowledging the subordination of the Jewish theocracy to the empire of Rome.
Milman, Hist. of Christianity, I. 141.

Judas Iscariot (jö′das is-kar′i-ot). [Heb. (see Judah); Gr. Ἰούδας Ἰσκαριώτης. The surname Iscariot is from Kerioth in Judah.] One of the twelve apostles, the betrayer of Jesus.

Judas Maccabæus (jö′das mak-a-bē′us). Died 160 B. C. The second of the five sons of Mattathias the Hasmonean. He succeeded his father in 166 as commander and leader in the struggle against Antiochus Epiphanes. In the battles at Bethhoron and Bethzur (south of Jerusalem) he gained a decisive victory over the Syrians, and on the 25th Chisleu (December), 164, he entered Jerusalem and reconsecrated the temple: in memory of this event the feast of dedication (hanukah) was instituted. Later he fought many battles, and at last fell in an encounter with the Syrians under Bacchides.

Judas Maccabæus. An oratorio by Handel, produced in London 1747.

Judd (jud). Sylvester. Born at Westhampton, Mass., July 23, 1813: died at Augusta, Maine, Jan. 20, 1853. An American Unitarian clergyman and author. His chief work is the romance "Margaret" (1845).

Jude (jöd), or Judas, Saint. [Heb.: see Judah.] One of the twelve apostles, probably identical with Thaddeus and Lebbæus (doubtless a corruption of Thaddeus). There are no trustworthy traditions concerning him.

Judges, Book of. [Heb. Shofetim.] A book of the Old Testament: so named because it gives an account of the history of Israel under the rule of a series of leaders called judges. It describes the transition period between the conquest of Canaan and the growth of a strong, stable government. The judge was chieftain in ancient Semitic communities, and the chief, of whatever title, always exercised juridical functions. The ancient Carthaginians called their rulers by the same name, suffetes. The most famous judges were Deborah and Barak, Gideon, Jephthah, Samson, Eli, and Samuel. According to its own chronology, the book covers a period of 410 years, but there are many difficulties in the way of the acceptance of this number.

Judgment of Paris, The. 1. A painting by Rubens, in the museum at Dresden. The three goddesses, accompanied by their attributes, and more or less completely undraped, stand in the foreground of a woodland. Paris sits on a stone holding the apple, with Mercury at his elbow offering advice. This is the original of the painting in the National Gallery, London. 2. A painting by Rubens, in the National Gallery, London. Mercury offers counsel to Paris, who is seated on a rock, in shepherd's costume; opposite stand the three goddesses, more or less undraped.

Judith (jö′dith). An Early English poem, probably of the 7th century, first printed in 1698.

In the same manuscript, which contains the only known copy of "Beowulf," is a fragment—about a fourth part—of another First-English poem, its theme being the Bible story of Judith. Professor Stephens infers, not only from its genuine poetic force, but from its use of a variation in the number of accents marking changes of emotion, a device found nowhere else in First-English except in Cædmon's Paraphrase, that the shaping of this poem is to be ascribed to Cædmon. Morley, English Writers, II. 180.

Judith. The name of the heroine of the Book of Judith (which see).

Judith, Book of. One of the apocryphal books of the Old Testament. It is a historical romance dating from the Maccabean period (probably from about 129 B. C.), and was apparently written in Hebrew. The original text is no longer extant: it exists at present in two distinct recensions, the Greek and the Latin. The heroine is named Judith (whence the name of the book), and is represented as a native of Bethulia. In order to deliver her native city, which is besieged by Holofernes, a general of the King of the Assyrians, she enters the Assyrian camp under the pretense of wishing to betray the city, gains admission to the general's tent through her extraordinary beauty, and slays him in his drunken sleep.

Judson (jud′son), Adoniram. Born at Malden, Mass., Aug. 9, 1788: died at sea, April 12, 1850. An American Baptist missionary. He settled in Burma in 1813. He translated the Bible into Burmese in 1835, and wrote a Burmese-English dictionary.

Juel (yō′el), Niels. Born at Copenhagen, May 8, 1629: died at Copenhagen, April 8, 1697. A Danish admiral, distinguished in the war against Sweden 1675–77.

Juggernaut (jug′ėr-nât). [A corruption of the Skt. Jagannatha, Lord of the world.] A name of Vishnu or Krishna, and also of Rama and Dattatreya, both incarnations of Vishnu. He is worshiped elsewhere in India, but the Jagannath festival at Puri, near Cuttack in Orissa, is especially celebrated. Its special feature is the drawing of the great car. Such cars, attached to every large Vishnu pagoda in the south of India, typify the moving active world over which the god presides. The Jagannath festival takes place in June or July, and for weeks before pilgrims come into Puri by thousands. The car is 45 feet high, 35 feet square, and supported on 16 wheels 7 feet in diameter. Balarama, the brother, and Subhadra, the sister of Jagannatha, have separate cars a little smaller. When the images are placed on the cars, the multitude kneel, bow their foreheads in the dust, and, rushing forward, draw the cars down the broad street toward Jagannath's country house. The distance is less than a mile, but the journey takes several days. When the zeal of the pilgrims flags, 4,200 professional pullers drag the cars. An error underlies the common foreign conception of the festival. "In a closely-packed eager throng of a hundred thousand men and women under the blazing tropical sun deaths must occasionally occur. There have doubtless been instances of pilgrims throwing themselves under the wheels in a frenzy of religious excitement, but such instances have always been rare, and are now unknown. The few suicides that did occur were, for the most part, cases of diseased and miserable objects, who took this means to put themselves out of pain. The official returns now place this beyond doubt. Nothing could be more opposed to the spirit of Vishnu-worship than self-immolation. According to Chaitanya, the apostle of Jagannath, the destruction of the least of God's creatures is a sin against the Creator. Self-immolation he would have regarded with horror." *Sir W. W. o (jō'nō). 1. In Roman mythology, the queen eaven, the highest divinity of the Latin s in Italy next to Jupiter, of whom she was the sister and the wife. She was the parallel of the Greek Hera, with whom in later times she became to a considerable extent identified. She was regarded as the special protectress of marriage, and was the guardian of woman from birth to death. In Rome she was also the patron of the national finances, and a temple which contained the mint was erected to her, under the name of Juno Moneta, on the Capitoline. In her distinctively Italic character, Juno (called Lanuvina, from the site at Lanuvium of her chief sanctuary, or Hospita, the Protectress) was a war-goddess, represented as clad in a mantle of goat-skin, bearing a shield and an uplifted spear, and accompanied, like Athene, by a sacred serpent.

Jupiter (jō'pi-tèr). [L., from Jovis (earlier Diovis, Gr. Ζεύς, Ind. Dīaus) and pater, father Jove.] 1. In Roman mythology, the supreme deity, the parallel of the Greek Zeus, and the embodiment of the might and national dignity of the Romans. The central seat of his cult was the Capitoline Hill at Rome, where he had the title of Optimus Maximus ('Best and Greatest'). He was primarily a divinity of the sky, and hence was considered to be the originator of all atmospheric changes. His weapon was the thunderbolt. He controlled and directed the future, and sacrifices were offered to secure his favor at the beginning of every undertaking. He was also the guardian of property, whether of the state or of individuals. White, the color of the light of day, was sacred to him: hence white animals were offered to him in sacrifice, his priests wore white caps, his chariot was drawn by 4 white horses, and the consuls were dressed in white when they sacrificed to him upon assuming office. The eagle was especially consecrated to him. The surviving artistic representations of Jupiter are comparatively late, and betray Greek influence, imitating the type of the Greek Zeus. Also Jove.

2. The brightest of the superior planets, and the largest body of the solar system except the sun itself. Its sidereal period of revolution is 11.86198 Julian years, and its synodical period 399 days. Its mean distance from the sun is about 483,000,000 miles. Its equatorial diameter at its mean distance subtends an angle of 38″, so that its real diameter is about one tenth that of the sun (which subtends 1,922″), and about 11 times that of the earth (the solar parallax being 8″.9). Jupiter is flattened at the poles by no less than one seventeenth of its diameter. Its mass is about $\frac{1}{1047}$ of that of the sun, or 304 times that of the earth, making its mean density only 1.3, that of the earth being taken at 5.5. Gravity at its surface is 2½ times that at the earth. The most remarkable feature of the appearance of this planet is the equatorial fasciæ or bands which cross its disk. These fasciæ subsist generally for months or even years, but occasionally form in a few hours. They sometimes have a breadth of one sixth of the apparent disk of the planet. There are also spots of much greater permanence. It is, however, probable that no solid matter can be seen, and quite doubtful whether any exists in the planet. The spots revolve about the axis in 9 hours, 55 minutes, and 35 seconds, but the white clouds in 5½ minutes less time. From his photometric observations Zöllner calculates the albedo of Jupiter to be 0.6: so high a value as to suggest that the planet must be self-luminous. Jupiter has seven satellites or moons. Their periods of revolution are as follows: I. 1d. 18h. 28m. 35.945s.; II. 3d. 13h. 17m. 53.735s.; III. 7d. 3h. 59m. 35.854s.; IV. 16d. 18h. 5m. 6.928s.; V. 11h. 57½m.; VI. 253.4 days; VII. 265 days. The last two were discovered by C. D. Perrine of the Lick Observatory, Dec. 3, 1904, and Jan. 2, 1905.

Jussieu, Bernard de. Born at Lyons, France, Aug. 17, 1699: died at Paris, Nov. 6, 1776. A noted French botanist. At first a physician, he later devoted himself to the study of botany, and in 1758 became superintendent of the garden of the Trianon. He was the founder of the natural system of classification of plants.

Jussieu, Joseph de. Born in 1704: died April 11, 1779. A French botanist. In 1735 he went to Peru with Condamine and Godin. He spent 15 years studying the botany of the Andean region, paying special attention to cinchona plants. His collections were lost through the dishonesty of a servant, a misfortune which caused Jussieu to lose his reason. In this state he returned to France in 1771.

Juste (zhüst), Théodore. Born at Brussels, Jan. 11, 1818: died there, Aug. 12, 1888. A Belgian historian. His works include "Histoire de la Belgique" (1838), "Histoire de la révolution des Pays-Bas sous Philippe II." (1855–63), "Les fondateurs de la monarchie belge" (1865–84), etc.

Justin (jus'tin). Lived before the 5th century A.D. A Roman historian, author of an epitome of a lost history by Trogus (ed. by Dübner 1831), etc.

Justin, Saint, surnamed "The Martyr," or "The Philosopher." Died probably about 163 A.D.

A celebrated Greek church father. He was born of Greek parents at Flavia Neapolis, a Roman colony built on the site of the ancient Shechem in Palestine. He devoted himself to the study of philosophy, and became an adherent and a teacher of the Platonic system. Originally a pagan, he afterward embraced Christianity, and is said to have been scourged and beheaded at Rome.

Justin I. Died Aug. 1, 527. Byzantine emperor 518–527. He was of barbarian, probably Gothic, extraction, and was a native of Tauresium in Dardania. He entered the guards of the emperor Leo I., and was commander-in-chief of the imperial guards in the reign of Anastasius, on whose death in 518 he was proclaimed emperor by the soldiers.

Justin II. Died Oct. 5, 578. Byzantine emperor 565–578, nephew of Justinian I. whom he succeeded. During his reign northern Italy was conquered by the Lombards, who founded the Kingdom of the Lombards in 568; and several important conquests were made by the Persians in the Asiatic provinces.

Justina (jus-tī′nä). [L., fem. of Justinus.] Patroness of Padua and (with St. Mark) of Venice. She is said to have been a native of Padua, and to have suffered martyrdom at that city in 304. Her supposed relics, said to have been recovered in 1177, are preserved at Padua in a church which bears her name. She is commemorated by the Roman Catholic Church on Oct. 7.

Justinian (jus-tin′i-an) I. (Flavius Anicius Justinianus), surnamed "The Great." Born at Tauresium, Dardania, Illyricum, probably May 11, 483: died Nov. 14, 565. Byzantine emperor 527–565, nephew of Justin I. whom he succeeded. He married in 525 Theodora, an actress, who exercised great influence during his reign, chiefly in ecclesiastical affairs. In 532 a fight broke out in the hippodrome between the Green and the Blue factions, the latter of which favored the emperor and the orthodox church. The fight spread from the hippodrome to the city, and the Green proclaimed Hypatius, nephew of Anastasius I., emperor. The revolt was put down by the general Belisarius with the assistance of the Blue, but not before 30,000 of the insurgents had been slain and a large part of the city destroyed, including the Church of Saint Sophia, which was rebuilt 532–537 with great splendor according to plans furnished by the architect Anthemius. In the East Justinian purchased peace from the Persians in 531, but in the West the victories of his generals Belisarius and Narses destroyed the Vandal and the Ostrogothic kingdoms in Africa and Italy respectively, and restored those countries to the Byzantine empire. An important event of his reign was the publication of the Justinian Code (which see).

Justinian II., surnamed Rhinotmetus ('he whose nose is cut off'). Died in Dec., 711. Byzantine emperor 685–695 and 705–711, son of Constantine IV. He was deposed in 695 by his general Leontius, who cut off his nose and banished him to Cherson. He made his escape from Cherson, and regained his throne with the assistance of Terbelis, the king of the Bulgarians, in 705, but was overthrown by Philippicus in 711 and killed.

Justinian Code. The body of Roman law compiled and annotated at the command of the emperor Justinian. This consists of the "Pandects," or the condensed opinions of the jurists, in fifty books; the "Institutiones"; and the "Novellæ" or "Novellæ Constitutiones," a collection of ordinances—the whole forming the "Corpus Juris Civilis," or body of civil law, the most important of all monuments of jurisprudence.

Jüterbog (yü′ter-boG), or Jüterbock (yü′ter-bok). A town in the province of Brandenburg, Prussia, situated on the Nuthe 40 miles south-southwest of Berlin. It was the scene of a victory of the Swedes over the Imperialists in 1644. Population (1890), commune, 7,181.

Jutes (jöts). A Low German tribe which, with the Saxons and Angles, invaded Great Britain in the 5th century. According to tradition they were invited by the Britons to aid them against the Picts, and landed at Ebbsfleet, under Hengist and Horsa, about 449. They founded the kingdom of Kent. Their connection with Jutland has been matter of dispute. See the extract.

> Now, as to the first settlement of Jutes under Hengist and Horsa (Horse and Mare), who established themselves in Kent, Hampshire, and the Isle of Wight, and whom Bede distinctly believed to have come from Jutland, it is to be observed that Jutland is now occupied by Danes, and that men from Jutland settling on our eastern coasts in the days of the Angles were called Danes; but that in this case they are called "Jutes," not "Danes," and do not seem to have been Danish. Where there has been a Danish settlement, towns commonly are found with names ending in "by." Thus in Lincolnshire, within a dozen miles of Great Grimsby, there stand Foresby, Utterby, Fotherby, Ashby-cum-Fenby, Barnoldby, Irby, Laceby, Keelby, Grasby, Brocklesby, Ulceby. Yet throughout this "Jute" region of Kent, Hampshire, and the Isle of Wight there is not even one place to be found that has a name ending in "by." There is no clear ground for asserting, although it has been suggested as one way of conquering this difficulty, that a Germanic people occupied Jutland in the middle of the 5th century. . . . Dr. Latham . . . argues that the "Jutes" of the first settlement were, in fact, Goths; or that, if Jutes, they were Jutes who came in company with Goths, and that they came, not out of Jutland, but only from the coast of Gaul, across the straits that divide Gaul from Britain.

ke-her'). [Arabic kabir, great.] A religious reformer. He was a weaver, and a Musulman by birth, who lived at Benares, and also at Magar near Gorakhpur, between 1488 and 1512. His teachings exercised an important influence in upper India in the 15th and 16th centuries, and formed the basis of the Sikh movement in the Panjab. Originally a Musulman, he became a pupil of Ramananda and a Vaishnava with much of the democracy and tolerance of Buddhism; but he denounced all idol-worship, and taught Vaishnavism as a form of strict monotheism. True religion, he said, meant nothing but devotion to one God, whether called Vishnu, Rama, or Hari, or by Mohammedan names. He rejects every malevolent distinction of caste, religion, and sect. All authority in faith and morals belongs to the guru, or spiritual guide, though the rights of conscience of the believer are reserved. Kabir's aim was evidently to found a religion that should unite Hindu and Mussulman.

Kabirpanthis (ke-bēr-pän't-hēz). ['Those who follow the path of Kabir.'] The followers of Kabir. They now form 12 principal branches, which have remained in communion notwithstanding some differences in faith and practice. Their center is Benares, but they are found in Gujarat, Central India, and as far as the Deccan. As they take pains to conform in unessentials to the usages about them, it is difficult to ascertain their number. At the end of the last century 35,000 took part in a melah at Benares. They are influential rather than numerous.

2. The capital of the Hittites, on the Orontes near Tel Nebi Mende. About 1300 B. C. Rameses II. of the 19th dynasty gained there a decisive victory over the Hittites.

Like Carchemish, Kadesh on the Orontes, the most southern capital the Hittites possessed, was also a "holy city." Pictures of it have been preserved on the monuments of Rameses II. We gather from them that it stood on the shore of the Lake of Homs, still called the "Lake of Kadesh," at the point where the Orontes flowed out of the lake. The river was conducted round the city in a double channel, across which a wide bridge was thrown, the space between the two channels being apparently occupied by a wall.

Kaikawus (kī-kâ-wös′). In the Shahnamah, the twelfth Iranian king, son of Kaiqubad, reigning 150 years. A dev or demon, disguised as a singer, sings before the king the beauties of Mazandaran, whence he resolves to conquer the country. Kaikawus succeeds with the aid of Rustam, who has his seven adventures during this war. (See Rustam.) The king next invades Hamavaran, the king of which yields to him and gives him his daughter Saudabah in marriage. The king of Hamavaran, however, treacherously seizes Kawus and imprisons him, during which time Afrasyab attacks Iran. Rustam defeats the three hostile kings and delivers Kawus. The war with Afrasyab lasts during the whole reign. The history of Kaikawus contains, besides the account of Rustam's seven adventures, that of Suhrab and that of Syawaush. (See Suhrab, Syawaush.) In his pride Kaikawus sought to fly to the heavens, and harnessed to his throne four eagles. Wearied, they descended and threw the king on the ground near Amol. He escaped with his life, and, pardoned by God for his arrogance, ruled on. The name is the Kaoses of the Byzantine historians.

Kaikeyi (kī-kā′yē). In Hindu mythology, a princess of Kaikeya, wife of King Dasharatha and mother of his third son, Bharata. Carefully tending Dasharatha when wounded, she induced him to promise any two favors. She used this promise to procure the exile of Rama and the promotion of Bharata.

Kaikhusrau (present Pers. pron. kī-khus-rou′; earlier kī-khos-rou′). [See Kai. Khusrau is the Skt. sushravas, Avestan husravanh (nom. husrava), famous, Gr. Ὀάρσης and Chosroes.] In the Shahnamah, the thirteenth Iranian king. He reigned 60 years. He was the son of Syawaush and Farangis, daughter of Afrasyab. After the murder of Syawaush by Gurwi, Afrasyab was about to slay Farangis, that none of the offspring of Iraj might live; but Piran Wisah persuaded the king to put her in his care. Piran saved her child when born, and had him brought up by shepherds. Afrasyab, frightened by a dream in which the son of Syawaush destroyed him, summoned Piran, who allayed the fears of Afrasyab by representing the boy as an idiot. When he warred with Kaikawus, Afrasyab sent Farangis and Khusrau to a remote place, but Giv found them and brought them to Kaikawus, who appointed Khusrau his successor. Khusrau continued the war, and slew Afrasyab. The name Kaikhusrau is identified with that of the elder Cyrus, with the legends of whom as told by the Greeks there are accordances.

Kairwan (kīr-wän′), or Kirwan (kēr-wän′). A city 87 miles south of Tunis. It is a holy Mohammedan city, founded about 670. The Djamaät es-Sehebi, or Mosque of the Companion of the Prophet, is the chief sanctuary of the city. Within the usual inclosing wall there are four beautiful arcaded courts, domed vestibules, the mosque proper, and the Shrine of the Companion, Abdullah ibn-Zemâa el-Beloui, a small domed structure with ornament of heterogeneous character and date. The remainder of the monument abounds with the richest Arabic decoration in plaster-work, inlaid tiles, elaborate carpentry, and color. The square minaret is incrusted with tiles, and has an Ajimez window in each face at the top. The great mosque of Sidi Akbar is a venerable monument occupying the northern corner of the city. In plan it is a rectangle which is divided into three parts, the place of worship proper, the vestibule, and the cloistered court in which stands the minaret. The mosque proper consists of 17 aisles of 8 arches springing from coupled columns of marble and porphyry. These columns number 296, and in the entire building there are 439, all taken from old Roman and Christian monuments. The mihrab and mimbar are beautifully ornamented. There is a central dome, which rests on porphyry columns about 42 feet high. The court is surrounded by a double arcade with coupled columns. Population, estimated, about 15,000. Karabel (kä-rä-bel′). See the extract.

The Pass of Karabel is a narrow defile, shut in on either side by lofty cliffs, through which ran the ancient road from Ephesos in the south to Sardes and Smyrna in the north. The Greek historian Herodotos tells us that the Egyptian conqueror Sesostris had left memorials of himself in this place. "Two images cut by him in the rock" were to be seen beside the road which led "from Ephesos to Phokaea and from Sardes to Smyrna. On either side a man is carved, a little over three feet in height, who holds a spear in the right hand and a bow in the left. The rest of his accoutrement is similar, for it is Egyptian and Ethiopian, and from one shoulder to the other, right across the breast, Egyptian hieroglyphics have been cut which declare: 'I have won this land with my shoulders.'" These two images were the object of my journey. One of them had been discovered by Renouard in 1839, and shortly afterwards sketched by Texier; the other had been found by Dr. Beddoe in 1856. Sayce, Hittites, p. 54.

The Karmathians regarded the Koran as an allegorical book, rejected all revelation, fasting, and prayer, and were communistic, even in the matter of wives. They carried on wars against the califate, particularly in the 10th century, but disappeared soon after. According to some accounts the Druses developed from them.

Karna (kär′na). In Hindu mythology, son of Pritha or Kunti by Surya, 'the sun,' before her marriage to Pandu, and so the unknown half-brother of the Pandava princes. He was born equipped with arms and armor. The sage Durvasas had given Kunti a charm by which she might have offspring by any god invoked, and she chose the sun. Afraid of disgrace, Kunti exposed the child by the Yamuna, where it was found by the charioteer of Dhritarashtra, who had it reared by his wife Radha. In the war Karna took the part of the Kauravas, and was at last killed by Arjuna. After his death, his relationship becoming known, great kindness was shown to his family.

Karnak (kär′nak). A village in Egypt, on the eastern bank of the Nile, on the site of Thebes, famous for its remains of antiquity. The Great Temple extends to a length of about 1,200 feet from west to east, and is comparatively regular in plan. The double pylon of the great court is about 370 feet wide; the court is colonnaded at the sides, and has an avenue of columns in the middle. A second pylon follows, and opens on the famous hypostyle hall, 170 by 329 feet, with central avenue of 12 columns 62 feet high and 11½ in diameter, and 122 columns 42½ feet high at the sides. The lintel-blocks of the portal are 41 feet long. A narrow court follows, ornamented with Osiride figures and containing two obelisks, one of which is erect and is 97½ feet high, being surpassed only by that of St. John Lateran at Rome. This court precedes a structure containing the usual series of halls and chambers, and an isolated cella or sanctuary. Behind this building is another large open court, at the back of which stands the columnar edifice of Thothmes III., an extensive building containing a large hypostyle hall and many comparatively small halls and chambers. The existing temple appears to have been begun by Usertesen I. (about 2700 B.C.), to whose modest foundation extensive additions were made by Thothmes I. and III., Seti I., Rameses II. and III., and Shishak (about 950 B.C.). The mural sculptures are vast in quantity, and highly interesting in character, particularly those which portray the racial characteristics of various conquered Asiatic peoples. A complete temple of Amen, built by Rameses III., extends toward the south from the great court. The pylon of Ptolemy Euergetes is a conspicuous monument at the end of the long avenue of sphinxes leading from Luxor. The pylon has a single large square portal, and is surmounted by a frieze carved with the winged solar disk and by the overhanging cornice. It is covered inside and out with bands of sculpture representing Ptolemy and his queen paying honor to his predecessors and to the gods. In one of the interior compartments Ptolemy appears in Greek costume, an exceedingly rare type. The temple of Khonsu, one of the Theban triad, was founded by Rameses III. It is notable chiefly for its beautiful hypostyle hall, whose great columns and epistyle beams are deeply cut with hieroglyphs and with cœlanaglyphic reliefs of kings and divinities. The exterior wall also presents much remarkable sculpture. Also Carnac.

Kemble, Frances Anne, generally known as Fanny. Born at London, Nov. 27, 1809: died there, Jan. 15, 1893. An Anglo-American actress, Shaksperian reader, and author: daughter of Charles Kemble. She made her first public appearance in 1829, with the intention of retrieving the fortunes of her family, in which at the end of 3 years she was successful. She visited America in 1832, and married Pierce Butler in 1834, from whom she afterward obtained a divorce. She resumed her maiden name, and lived at Lenox, Massachusetts, returning to Europe at intervals. In 1848–49 she gave her first series of Shaksperian readings in Boston, followed by readings in other cities. In these she was very successful. In 1851 she again went upon the stage in England. From 1860 to 1873 she was also in Europe. She wrote "Journal of a Residence in America" (1835), "The Star of Seville" (1837, a play), "Poems" (1844), "A Year of Consolation" (1847), "Records of a Girlhood" (1878), "Notes upon some of Shakspere's Plays" (1882), "Records of Later Life" (1882), "Life on a Georgia Plantation" (1863).

Kemble, John Philip. Born at Prescott, near Liverpool, Feb. 1, 1757: died at Lausanne, Switzerland, Feb. 26, 1823. A celebrated English tragedian, son of Roger Kemble. In 1771 he left a Roman Catholic school in Staffordshire for the English college at Douai, where he received a good education; but he could not agree to his father's plan of having him enter the church. He played in his father's company while still a child, but on Jan. 8, 1776, he made his real début at Wolverhampton as Theodosius, and played on the York circuit, as well as in Dublin and Cork, with growing success till Sept. 30, 1783, when he made his first appearance in London at Drury Lane as Hamlet. Here he created a good deal of excitement and some unfriendly criticism: he had not yet measured the full extent of his power. He remained with this company for 19 years. In Nov., 1783, his sister, Mrs. Siddons, first played with him and overshadowed him. In 1788–89 he undertook the management of Drury Lane, and in 1802 of Covent Garden. It was on the occasion of his opening the New Covent Garden Theatre, in 1809, with a new scale of prices rendered necessary by the expenses incurred, that the famous "old-price riots" occurred. He was a stately actor, with a somewhat stilted and declamatory style. In Coriolanus he was at his best, but he won applause as Richard III., Hamlet, Cato, Wolsey, Zanga, Penruddock, Jaques, Pierre, Brutus, Hotspur, Octavian, etc. In comedy he was not so successful.

His name is especially associated with the three laws of planetary motion (Kepler's laws). The first two were announced in his "De Motibus Stellæ Martis" in 1609, and he discovered the third on March 8, 1618. The three laws are as follows: (a) The orbits of the planets are ellipses having the sun at one focus. (b) The areas described by their radii vectores in equal times are equal. (c) The squares of their periodic times are proportional to the cubes of their mean distances from the sun. His complete works were edited by Frisch (1858–71).

Kerethim (ker'ē-thim). See the extract.

> David instituted a bodyguard of Kerethim and Pelethim, or rather of Cretans and Philistines (2 Sam. xv. 18), to whom the Hebrew of 2 Sam. xx. 23 adds a name which has been obliterated in our English version, the Carians. These foreign soldiers were a sort of Janissaries attached to the person of the sovereign, after the common fashion of Eastern monarchs, who deem themselves most secure when surrounded by a band of followers uninfluenced by family connections with the people of the land. The consultation of the bodyguard appears to have remained unchanged to the fall of the Judæan state.

Kern-baby (kėrn'bā-bi), or Kernababy (kėr'-na-bā-bi). See the extract.

Let us take another piece of folklore. All North-country English folk know the Kernababy. The custom of the "Kernababy" is commonly observed in England, or, at all events, in Scotland, where the writer has seen many a kernababy. The last gleanings of the last field are bound up in a rude imitation of the human shape, and dressed in some tag-rags of finery. The usage has fallen into the conservative hands of children, but of old "the Maiden" was a regular image of the harvest goddess, which, with a sickle and sheaves in her arms, attended by a crowd of reapers, and accompanied with music, followed the last carts home to the farm. It is odd enough that the "Maiden" should exactly translate the old Sicilian name of the daughter of Demeter. "The Maiden" has dwindled, then, among us to the rudimentary kernababy; but ancient Peru had her own Maiden, her Harvest Goddess.
Lang, Custom and Myth, p. 17.

Kerner (ker'ner), Andreas Justinus. Born at Ludwigsburg, Würtemberg, Sept. 18, 1786: died at Weinsberg, Würtemberg, Feb. 21, 1862. A German lyric poet and medical writer. He was destined at the outset for a mercantile career, but ultimately studied natural history at Tübingen, where he was intimately associated with Uhland and Gustav Schwab, with whom he founded the so-called Swabian school of poetry. After 1819 he was district physician at Weinsberg, where he died. His poems are characterized by a true lyric quality: one at least of them, the "Wanderlied" ("Wander Song"), has become a genuine folk-song. He was a believer in spiritualistic manifestations, and wrote several works in this field, among them "Die Seherin von Prevorst" ("The Prophetess of Prevorst"). His principal prose work is "Reiseschatten von dem Schattenspieler Luchs" ("Magic Lantern Pictures of Travel by the Exhibitor Luchs," 1811).

[See Kaikhusrau.] As Kaikhusrau, the thirteenth Iranian king of the Shahnamah (see Kaikhusrau); in history, the name of the twenty-first and twenty-third Sassanian kings. Khusrau I. (called Nushirvan, "the generous mind") reigned 531–579. He had several wars with the Romans. At the conclusion of the first in 532 or 533, Justinian purchased peace by an annual tribute of 440,000 pieces of gold. One of the conditions imposed by Khusrau was that seven Greek philosophers who were pagans should be allowed to live in the Roman Empire without persecution. At the close of the second war (540–561) Justinian promised an annual tribute of 40,000 pieces of gold, and received in return the cession of Colchis and Lazica. Khusrau died before the end of the third war, which began in 571. He was one of the greatest kings of Persia. His empire extended from the Indus to the Red Sea, and large portions of central Asia, perhaps also a part of eastern Europe, recognized him as their king. He was despotic and cruel but firm, encouraging agriculture, trade, and learning. He caused various Greek, Latin, and Sanskrit works to be translated into Persian. Khusrau II. (surnamed Parviz or Parvez, "the generous") reigned 590 or 591–628. He recovered the throne of his father Hormisdas IV. with the aid of the Byzantine emperor Maurice. After the murder of Maurice, Khusrau made war upon the tyrant Phocas, conquering Mesopotamia, Syria, Palestine, Egypt, and Asia Minor, finally encamping at Chalcedon, opposite Constantinople. Heraclius saved the empire, recovering the lost provinces and carrying the war into Persia. Worn out, Khusrau resolved in 628 to abdicate in favor of his son Merdaza; but Shirvah or Siroes, his eldest son, anticipating the design, put his father to death. No Persian king lived so splendidly as Khusrau II.

Kidd (kid), Captain William. Born probably at Greenock, Scotland: hanged at Execution Dock, London, May 23, 1701. A notorious pirate. In 1695, on the recommendation of Robert Livingstone, a colonist, Richard Coote, earl of Bellamont, governor of Massachusetts Bay, placed Kidd in command of a privateer with a special commission to suppress piracy. Bellamont, Orford, Somers, Romney, and Shrewsbury were to pay the greater part of the cost. His ship, the Adventure, sailed from Plymouth for New York, May, 1696, and from New York to Madagascar. It was soon reported, however, that Kidd had become a pirate himself, and when he returned to Boston, July, 1699, he was arrested. He pretended that he had been overpowered by his crew, and that acts of piracy had been committed against his will, and that other ships had been taken under French passes. He failed, however, to give a satisfactory account of the Queda Merchant, his last prize. Kidd and several of his crew were sent to England and were tried at the Old Bailey and executed. A portion of the Queda Merchant's treasure was buried on Gardiner's Island, New York, and is popularly supposed never to have been recovered, but was removed by the colonial authorities in 1699.

He entered the army in 1795, but in 1799 left it to study at Frankfort and Berlin. In 1801 he went to Paris, and afterward to Switzerland, where he again traveled in 1803. In 1804 he was given a subordinate government position at Königsberg, but resigned it after the disastrous battle of Jena. In 1807 he went to Dresden, and engaged there in editorial work on a newspaper. In 1809 he went to Prague, where he wrote as a pamphleteer against France in the war with Austria; but after the defeat of Wagram he returned to Berlin and again took up his work as a journalist. The first of his dramas, the tragedy "Die Familie Schroffenstein" ("The Family Schroffenstein"), appeared in 1803; "Amphitryon" in 1807; the tragedy "Penthesilea" in 1808; the chivalric drama "Käthchen von Heilbronn" in 1810; and the comedy "Der zerbrochene Krug" ("The Broken Jug") in 1811. He also wrote "Erzählungen" ("Tales," 1810–11), and a few lyrics. His fame is almost wholly posthumous. His literary efforts met with but little success during his life, and he at last not only became despondent, but was actually threatened with need. After first carrying out the promise he had made to a female friend, as morbid as himself, to kill her, he committed suicide when only 34 years old. Two dramas were published after his death: "Die Hermannsschlacht" ("The Battle of Hermann," i. e. Arminius), and "Der Prinz von Homburg" ("The Prince of Homburg"). "Robert Guiscard" is a fragment. His collected writings were first published at Berlin, 1826, in 3 vols.

Klopstock (klop'stok), Friedrich Gottlieb. Born at Quedlinburg, Prussia, July 2, 1724: died at Hamburg, March 14, 1803. A noted German poet. Before 1745, when he went to Jena to study theology, he had already conceived the plan of the religious epic afterward written as the "Messias" ("The Messiah"). In Leipsic, in 1748, he published anonymously, in the journal "Bremer Beiträge," the first three cantos of the poem. This same year he went as tutor to Langensalza. In 1750 he accepted the invitation of the poet and historian Bodmer to Zurich, but the succeeding year was summoned by the King of Denmark to Copenhagen, that he might there find the leisure to complete his poem. He remained there until 1771; went then to Hamburg; in 1775 was for a year in Karlsruhe; and then returned to Hamburg, where he subsequently lived. The "Messias," a poem consisting of twenty cantos written in hexameters, did not appear in its complete form until 1773. "Geistliche Lieder" ("Religious Songs") appeared in 1758, and "Oden" ("Odes") in 1771. He also wrote three dramas on biblical subjects: "Der Tod Adams" ("The Death of Adam," 1757), "Salomo" ("Solomon"), and "David" (1772). Three others were written on subjects from early national history: "Hermannsschlacht" ("The Battle of Hermann," i. e. Arminius, 1769), "Hermann und die Fürsten" ("Hermann and the Princes," 1784), "Hermanns Tod" ("Hermann's Death," 1787). The last three dramas were in prose interspersed with bardic choruses, so called, and were consequently named by him "Bardiete." Minor poems are the ode "An meine Freunde" ("To My Friends," 1747), later changed to "Wingolf," addressed to the poets of the Saxon school; the "Kriegslied" ("War Song"), written in 1749 in honor of Frederick the Great; and the ode "Hermann und Thusnelda," written in 1752. His principal prose work is "Die Gelehrtenrepublik" ("The Scholars' Republic," 1744), an art of poetry from his own standpoint. His complete works appeared (Leipsic, 1844–45) in 11 vols.

Knecht Ruprecht (knećht rō'prećht). [G., 'Knight Rupert.'] The German genius of Christmas, corresponding to St. Nicholas, or Santa Claus. In some parts of Germany he is supposed to appear just previous to Christmas, with a bag on his back and a rod in his hand, to inquire into the conduct of the children, whom he rewards or punishes according to their deserts. The actual dispenser of gifts on Christmas Eve is, however, the Christ-child.

Kneller (nel'ėr), Sir Godfrey (Gottfried Kniller). Born at Lübeck, Germany, Aug. 8, 1646: died at London, Oct. 19, 1723. A German-English portrait-painter. His father was a portrait-painter of Lübeck. Godfrey was sent to Leyden to study mathematics and fortification. He abandoned the career of a soldier and entered the atelier of Ferdinand Bol at Amsterdam, receiving probably some instruction from Rembrandt. In 1672 he went to Italy; from Italy he went to Hamburg. In 1675 he found his way to England, and to the patronage of Mr. Vernon, secretary to the Duke of Monmouth, and later to that of the duke himself, whose portrait he painted, and who recommended him to Charles II. For Charles he painted the portrait of Louis XIV. in Paris. He succeeded to the patronage of James II., William III., and Anne, and was knighted March 3, 1691. Some of his best portraits are in the series of admirals. He was contemporary and rival of Sir Peter Lely. He painted the portraits of ten reigning sovereigns.

Knight of the Burning Pestle, The. A mock-heroic drama by Beaumont and Fletcher, published anonymously in 1613. It was intended to satirize such plays as Heywood's "Four Prentices of London," in which extravagantly chivalric and knightly language was put into the mouths of the middle class. It was doubtless suggested by "Don Quixote."

Knight of the Rueful Countenance. Don Quixote: so called by Sancho Panza.

Knight of the Swan. See Swan and Lohengrin.

Knights (nīts), The. A comedy of Aristophanes, exhibited in 424 B. C.

The play ["Knights"] personifies the Athenian Demos as an easy-going, dull-witted old man, with Nikias, Demosthenes, and Cleon among his slaves, among whom the latter has attained a tyrannical ascendancy by alternate bullying his fellows and flattering his master. By the advice of oracles, which play a great part all through the play, and which imply an earnest faith in religion among the Athenian people of that day, the former two persuade a low sausage-seller (Agoracritus) to undertake the task of supplanting Cleon. He is assisted by the chorus of Knights, who are determined enemies of Cleon, and who come in to defend their friends, and attack the demagogue, in their famous parabasis. The greater part of the remainder is occupied with the brazen attempts of both demagogues to out-bully one another, and to devise bribes and promises to gain Demos' favour. At last Agoracritus prevails and retires with Demos, whom he presently reproduces, apparently by eccyclema, sitting crowned, and in his right mind, heartily ashamed of his former follies.
Mahaffy, Hist. of Classical Greek Lit., I. 442.

Knights, The. A comedy by Foote, produced in 1749, printed in 1754, in which he played Hartop.

Knightsbridge (nīts'brij). 1. In old London, the bridge across the Tyburn, by which the old Reading road passed: so called from the manor of Neyte, near Kensington. *W. J. Knights of the Round Table. See Round Table.

Knight's Tale of Palamon and Arcite, The. One of Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales." It is a recasting by Chaucer of his version of Boccaccio's "Teseide," which he made before he wrote the "Legend of Good Women."

The "Knight's Tale," in particular, naturally attracted the attention of the dramatists of the Elizabethan age, who were always on the lookout for suitable material. Upon it was founded an early play called "Palemon and Arcite" that has not come down. It was the work of Richard Edwards, and was produced in 1566 at Oxford University before Queen Elizabeth. A play with this title is also recorded by Henslowe under the year 1594 as having been acted four times. From the same tale also was avowedly taken the drama called "The Two Noble Kinsmen," which, when first printed in 1634, had on its title-page as authors the names of Shakspeare and Fletcher. Whether either had anything to do with it is still a debated question. Lounsbury, Chaucer, III. 68.

Knight's Vision, The. An allegorical painting by Raphael, in the National Gallery, London. In the foreground a youth sleeps, resting on his shield. Beside him stand two girls: one, personifying fame, holding out a sword and a book; and the other, representing pleasure, extending a myrtle-blossom. The background is occupied with rocks, hills, and towers. The work is of Raphael's youth, admirable in conception and execution.

Kongo, or Congo (kong'gō), Pg. Zaire (zä-ē're), called by Stanley the Livingstone. A river of central Africa. It rises as the Luapula in the highland separating the basins of Lakes Tanganyika and Nyassa (about lat. 10° S.), rounds Lake Bangweolo on the south, flows northward through Lake Moero to Lake Lanji, and there receives the Lukuga as an affluent from Tanganyika. The united stream, now known as the Lualaba, flows northward to Stanley Falls, beyond the equator, whence to the sea, over its main course, it is called the Kongo. It discharges into the Atlantic Ocean in lat. 6° S., about 240 miles southwest of Stanley Pool. It is navigable by ocean steamers from its mouth to Matadi (110 miles) and by river steamers from Stanley Pool to Stanley Falls. These two navigable sections are being connected by a railroad. It is second in volume to the Amazon, and is, among African rivers, next to the Nile in length. Its chief tributaries are the Aruwimi, Mobangi, and Kassai. It has been explored by Cameron, Livingstone, Stanley, and others. Length, estimated, about 3,000 miles.

Kongo, French, F. Congo Français (kôn-gō' fräⁿ-sä'). The official name, since 1891, of the French possessions between the Kongo and the Atlantic, lying south of the German territory of Kamerun. Previously they were called Gaboon, Gabun, or Gabonie, and Ouest Africain. The area is about 425,000 square miles, the population about 12,000,000. The country is fertile, but mostly insalubrious. The coast was discovered by the Portuguese in the 15th century, and held by them for a long period. In 1842 the French established their first trading-post on the Gaboon River, and extended their authority, in 1862, to Cape Lopez and the Ogowe River. When Stanley revealed the course of the Kongo, S. de Brazza connected the colony of Gaboon with Stanley Pool and annexed large tracts of country. The claims of France were recognized by the Berlin Conference in 1885. By an agreement made with Germany in 1894, French Kongo extends behind the Kamerun northward to Lake Chad.

Kongo Free State, or Kongo Independent State, or Kongo State: official name, Etat Indépendant du Congo. A state in western Africa, recognized and defined by the conference of European powers at Berlin in 1885. It lies mostly on the left bank of the lower Kongo and the Mobangi, extending to the northeastern watershed of the Kongo basin, eastward to long. 30° E., and southward, mainly on that meridian, to about lat. 13° S. It is the successor of the International African Association, founded by Leopold II. and organized by Stanley. This company established stations, annexed lands, hoisted its own flag, which was first recognized by the United States, and became so aggressive as to conflict with Portugal, France, and England. The Berlin Conference constituted (Feb. 26, 1885) the Kongo State, with Leopold II. as sovereign. The conditions under which it received most of the Kongo basin as its sphere of influence were that all nations and religions should have equal privileges within its borders, and that free trade should prevail. The latter clause was modified by the Brussels conferences of 1890 so as to enable the Kongo State and other countries concerned in the Kongo Free Trade Basin to levy certain import duties. By will, dated Aug. 2, 1889, Leopold II. bequeathed to Belgium all his sovereign rights, and by the convention of July 3, 1890 (continued Aug. 10, 1901), he gave Belgium the right to annex the Kongo State after a period of 10 years. Government is in the hands of an administrator at Boma and of bureaus at Brussels, under the supervision of the King of the Belgians. The chief exports are ivory, rubber, nuts, coffee, palm-oil. The principal state stations are Boma (the capital), Matadi, Leopoldville, Equator, Bangala, Stanley Falls, and Luluaburg. Estimated area, 900,000 square miles. Population, 30,000,000.

Kongo Nation. A great Bantu nation of West Africa, occupying both banks of the lower Kongo River. In its widest sense it consists of all the tribes between the Nyanga River, the upper Ogowe, Stanley Pool, the Kuango, and the mouth of the Lufuni (Lifune) River, south of Ambriz. The tribes north of the Kongo River speak dialects of the Kongo language, the principal being those of Loango, Kakongo, and Ngoio; and their beliefs, customs, industries, and physical appearance show a common origin; but at the time of the Portuguese discovery, in 1484, their allegiance to the King of Kongo had already become merely traditional. The Kongo Nation, in the strict sense, was and is composed of the tribes (called duchies and counties) of Mbamba, Sundi, Pangu, Sonho, Batta, and Pemba, which to this day recognize the sovereignty of the King of Kongo, although they are practically independent of his control. At the time of the discovery, the nation of Angola, ethnically and linguistically distinct from that of Kongo, though related, still acknowledged a dependence upon that of Kongo. The decadence of this great kingdom was temporarily stemmed by the friendship of the Portuguese and the nominal adoption of Christianity, which gave a new luster and prestige to the court of Kongo. But the relapse into heathenism, constant civil wars, and the suicidal exportation of slaves to America undermined the kingdom so thoroughly that in 1847 one of the royal pretenders was installed by the help of Portuguese arms, and virtually accepted a sort of protectorate. By the act of the Berlin Conference, 1885, Portugal was allowed to occupy and hold most of the Kongo proper and Ngoio (Cabinda), while most of the tribes of Kongo stock dwelling north of the Kongo River were allotted to France, and the northern margin of the river to the Kongo State. The King of Kongo has become a Portuguese vassal, and his kingdom has been organized as a district of Angola. The capital of the district is Cabinda; that of the native kingdom is San Salvador. The Kongo State, holding only a trifling portion of the old kingdom of Kongo, is in no wise its successor. The Kongo language, called Kishi-kongo in the court dialect, and Ki-kongo in the river dialect, is purely Bantu, and closely related to (though distinct from) Kimbundu, the language of Angola. Owing to the growing missionary literature, the use of Ki-kongo is extending far into the Kongo State, and it bids fair to become one of the great literary languages of Africa. The dialects correspond to the tribes enumerated above, to which might be added Hungu.

Kyd (kid), Thomas. Lived in the latter half of the 16th century. An English dramatist. He wrote usually on bloodcurdling subjects, and is best known by his two plays, "The First Part of Jeronimo or Hieronimo, etc.," published in 1605, and "The Spanish Tragedy" (licensed 1592, printed 1599 and 1602), written after the other, though purporting to precede it. He also translated Garnier's "Pompey the Great," known as "Cornelia," and wrote "Solimon and Perseda," etc. He is said to have died in poverty in 1595.

> The well-known epithet of Jonson, "sporting" Kyd, seems to have been either a mere play on the poet's name, or else a lucus a non lucendo; for both "Jeronimo" and its sequel are in the ghastliest and bloodiest vein of tragedy, and "Cornelia" is a model of stately dullness.

Lakshmana (laksh'ma-nạ). [Skt., 'having lucky marks'; from lakshman, mark, sign.] In Hindu mythology, son of Dasharatha by Sumitra, and twin brother of Shatrughna and half-brother and special friend of Rama. One eighth of Vishnu's divinity was manifest in him. A fierce war resulted from the mutilation by Lakshmana of Shurpanakha, Ravana's sister, who had attacked Sita on being repulsed by both Rama and Lakshmana. When Sita was carried off by Ravana, Lakshmana accompanied Rama in the search for her. He broke in upon Rama's interview with Kala, or Time, to save him from the curse of Durvasas, knowing that it would be fatal to do so. When he then retired, resigned, to the river Sharayu, the gods showered flowers upon him and bore him to heaven.

Lamennais (lä-me-nā'), Félicité Robert de. Born at St. Malo, June 19, 1782: died at Paris, Feb. 27, 1854. A French writer and philosopher. From earliest infancy he was dwarfed in stature, nervous, and irritable. He studied under his uncle's guidance, and taught himself Greek, Latin, and several modern languages. In time he became strongly attracted by the philosophical teachings of the 18th century, especially those of J. J. Rousseau. After publishing an essay, "Les philosophes," in 1802, he went to live for a while in the retirement of his native region. His "Réflexions sur l'état de l'église en France pendant le XVIII^e siècle, et sur sa situation actuelle" appeared in 1808, but was suppressed by the police until 1814. In 1811 he taught mathematics in the seminary of St. Malo; the following year he took the first orders, and in 1816 became a priest. He published the first volume of his great work "Essai sur l'indifférence en matière de religion" in 1817; the second volume is dated 1820, and the third and fourth are from 1822–23. With a view to spread his religious ideas, he founded a paper "L'Avenir" (1830). His doctrines favoring freedom in religious matters were not approved by the clergy, and his fearless utterances led to frequent censure and condemnation before the courts. In 1848 he founded a new paper, "Le Peuple Constituant." His last appearance as a political writer was in connection with his management of the journal "La Réforme." Among Lamennais's works are "Mélanges religieux et philosophiques" (1819–35), "Les paroles d'un croyant," "Le livre du peuple" (1837), "Questions politiques et philosophiques" (1840), "L'Esquisse d'une philosophie" (1842–46). His "Discussions critiques" came out in 1856, and likewise his translation of Dante's "Divina Commedia."

Lamentation of Mary Magdalen. A spurious poem introduced in the early editions of Chaucer. It was inserted under the impression that it was the lost "Origenes upon the Maudeleyne," which was probably a translation from a piece attributed to Origen. Lancelot. Same as Lancelot du Lac.

Lancelot du Lac. A French Arthurian romance. It was probably the work of Walter Map in the latter part of the 12th century: a Scottish metrical romance "Lancelot of the Laik" was made from this at the end of the 15th century. Chrestien de Troyes's metrical romance "Le Chevalier de la Charette" gives some of Lancelot's adventures, and was based on Map's prose romance. Sir Thomas Malory's "Morte d'Arthur" also does not give his entire story. Sir Lancelot was the son of Ban, king of Brittany, and was one of the most famous knights of the Round Table. He received the name "du Lac" from the fact that he was educated at the castle of Vivian, known as the Dame du Lac or Lady of the Lake. The main features of the legend are his guilty love for Guinevere and the exploits he performed in her service, and the war with Arthur in which his passion involved him. Guinevere retired to a convent, and Lancelot became a monk and a holy man, and died saying masses for the souls of his old companions in arms. He was the father of Sir Galahad by Elaine, the daughter of King Pelles, who is not the Elaine of Tennyson's poem.

Lara (lä'rä). The name of a family belonging to the Castilian aristocracy of the 10th century, whose adventures have been made the subject of many ballads. See the extract.

The ballads which naturally form the next group are those on the Seven Lords of Lara, who lived in the time of Garcia Fernandez, the son of Fernan Gonzalez. Some of them are beautiful, and the story they contain is one of the most romantic in Spanish history. The Seven Lords of Lara, in consequence of a family quarrel, are betrayed by their uncle into the hands of the Moors, and put to death; while their father, with the basest treason, is confined in a Moorish prison, where, by a noble Moorish lady, he has an eighth son, the famous Mudarra, who at last avenges all the wrongs of his race. On this story there are above thirty ballads: some very old and exhibiting either inventions or traditions not elsewhere recorded, while others seem to have come directly from the "General Chronicle." Ticknor, Span. Lit., I. 126.

Lares (lā′rēz). In Roman antiquity, a class of infernal deities whose cult was primitive. They were looked upon as natural protectors of the state and family, and also as powerful for evil if not duly respected and propitiated. The public Lares, originally two in number, were the guardians of the unity of the state, and were honored with temples and an elaborate ceremonial. After the time of Augustus, at least, each division of the city had also its own public Lares (Lares compitales). The private Lares differed for each family, and were worshiped daily in the house, being domiciled either on the family hearth or in a special shrine. They received also especial recognition upon every occasion of festivity, public or private, and on certain days devoted particularly to them, and claimed tribute alike from the bride upon entering the family and from the youth upon attaining his majority. The chief of the private Lares in each family, the domestic or household Lar (Lar familiaris) in the fullest sense, was the spirit of the founder of the family. To the family spirits were often added in later times, among the household Lares, the shades of heroes, or other personalities who were looked upon with admiration or awe. In their character as malignant divinities, the Lares were commonly classed under the title of Lemures or Larvæ.

Last Days of Pompeii. A historical novel by Bulwer, published in 1834. The scene is laid chiefly at Pompeii, 79 A. D.

Last Judgment, The. Among the noted paintings with this subject are the following. (a) A painting by Fra Angelico da Fiesole, in the Old Museum at Berlin. It is an altarpiece in 3 parts. (b) A famous painting by Michelangelo, covering the entire end wall above the high altar of the Sistine Chapel, Rome. The composition is separated into 5 subdivisions: (1) above, angels with the emblems of Christ's Passion; (2) upper middle, Christ, with a gesture of condemnation, as the divine Avenger, with Mary at his feet; (3) on both sides, the chief of the elect; (4) at Christ's feet, the angel sounding the trump of doom; (5) below, the fate of those awakened from the dead, the blessed borne upward, and the accursed dashed down by angels and hurled by devils into torment. The painting has suffered from incense and taper smoke, and above all from the clothing, by overscrupulous popes, of many of Michelangelo's undraped figures. (c) A fresco in the Campo Santo, Pisa, formerly ascribed to Orcagna, but now to the Lorenzetti (1350). The blessed and the dead are rising from their graves, and being conducted to one side or the other by angels or by devils. Many great ecclesiastical and civil dignitaries are represented as in the latter case. The subject is powerfully presented; the gesture of condemnation made by Christ toward the damned is famous. (d) A very large painting by Rubens (1617), in the Old Pinakothek at Munich. The Three Persons of the Trinity occupy the central upper part of the canvas. Christ sits, as Judge, with uplifted right arm motioning to the dead to rise. The saints are gathered about the Deity. Below, the dead are returning to life, and the entire right side is occupied by the damned, who are hurled down to perdition by the archangel Michael with flaming sword. (e) An altarpiece by Roger van der Weyden (1447), in the hospital at Beaune, France. It consists of 9 compartments, with 6 more on the outside shutters, and contains portraits of Chancellor Rollin (the donor), of Philippe le Bon of Burgundy, and other personages. It is one of the finest of early Flemish pictures, beautiful in color. (f) A painting by Fra Angelico, in the Accademia, Florence. Christ turns toward the blessed, with a gesture of doom to the lost, who, as they rise from their graves, are dragged off by devils to their fate. Among the lost appear monks and even popes. The angels and the blessed upon the flowery meadows, and at the gates of paradise, are of the greatest beauty and charm.

Last Sigh of the Moor, The. See the extract.

> There, at Padul, on a spur of the Alpuxarras, Boabdil stood and gazed back upon the kingdom he had lost: the beautiful Vega, the towers of the Alhambra, and the gardens of the Generalife; all the beauty and magnificence of his lost home. "Allahu Akbar," he said, "God is most great," as he burst into tears. His mother Ayesha stood beside him: "You may well weep like a woman," she said, "for what you could not defend like a man." The spot whence Boabdil took his sad farewell look at his city from which he was banished for ever, bears to this day the name of "el ultimo sospiro del Moro," "the last sigh of the Moor."

Last Supper, The. Among the noted representations of this subject are the following. (a) A painting by Dieric Bouts (1467), in St. Pierre at Louvain, Belgium. This is the central panel of a large altarpiece. The side panels are in the Berlin Museum. (b) A painting by Justus of Ghent, a pupil of Van Eyck, in the Istituto di belle Arti at Urbino. It is a beautiful early-Flemish picture, one of the oldest works in oils in Italy. Federigo da Montefeltro, with his family, and the Persian ambassador are introduced as spectators. (c) A painting by Luca Signorelli (1512), in the duomo of Cortona, Italy. It represents Christ as distributing bread to 3 kneeling apostles, while the others wait grouped behind. (d) A famous wall-painting by Leonardo da Vinci, in the refectory of Santa Maria delle Grazie at Milan. Christ is seated at the middle of the table, while the apostles are ranged on each side of him, full of excitement at the announcement of his impending betrayal. The painting has suffered greatly from damp, abuse, and repainting.

Last Token, The. A painting by Gabriel Max, in the Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York. It shows a beautiful young girl in the Roman arena, exposed to wild beasts. Some spectator has thrown her down a rose. She stands over it, resting her hand against the wall, and, looking up, tries to distinguish the one who has pitied her.

Lateran (lat'e-ran), The. A palace in the eastern part of Rome. The present edifice dates from the 16th to 18th centuries. The palace was originally named from the Roman family Lateranus to which, until the time of Nero, it belonged. Nero put the last owner, Plautius Lateranus, to death, and appropriated the palace. It was given by Constantine (who also built a church in its precincts) to the Bishop of Rome. See St. John Lateran and Scala Santa.

> Till the 14th century the Lateran was the usual residence of the pope; this was once a very extensive building, covering four times its present area. The original house is said to have belonged to the senator Plautius Lateranus in the reign of Nero; but the existing part on the line of the Aurelian wall is of the 3rd century. This house, which had become the property of the emperors, was given by Constantine as a residence for S. Sylvester; it was very much enlarged at many periods during the next ten centuries; in 1308 a great part was burnt, and in 1586 the ancient palace was completely destroyed by Sixtus V., and the present palace built by Domenico Fontana. The Capella Sancta Sanctorum is the only relic of the older palace. The present palace has never been used as a papal residence; in the 18th century it was an orphan asylum, and is now a museum of classical sculpture and early Christian remains. J. H. Middleton, in Encyc. Brit., XX. 835.

Lateran Council. The name of a number of ecclesiastical councils held in the Lateran Church at Rome. The following five are regarded by the Roman Catholic Church as ecumenical: (1) The council of 1123, under Calixtus II., which confirmed the Concordat of Worms (which see) and renewed the grant of indulgences promulgated by Urban II. in favor of the Crusaders. (2) The council of 1139, under Innocent II., which condemned the antipope Anacletus II. and Arnold of Brescia. (3) The council of 1179, under Alexander III., which declared that the popes should be elected exclusively by the college of cardinals, and that a two-thirds vote of the college should be necessary to form a valid election. (4) The council of 1215, under Innocent III., which condemned the Albigenses. (5) The council of 1512–17, under Julius II. and Leo X., which abrogated the canons of the Council of Pisa.

Latham (lā'tham), John. Born at Eltham, near London, June 27, 1740: died Feb. 4, 1837. A noted English physician and ornithologist, one of the founders of the Linnean Society (1788). His last years were spent in Winchester. He published "A General Synopsis of Birds" (1781–85), "Index Ornithologicus sive Systema Ornithologiæ" (1790), "A General History of Birds" (11 vols. 1821–28), etc.: the illustrations of the last-named work were all designed, etched, and colored by himself.

Latham (lā'tham), Robert Gordon. Born at Billingborough, Lincolnshire, March 24, 1812: died at Putney, March 9, 1888. A noted English philologist, ethnologist, and physician. He was a graduate of King's College, Cambridge, 1832; professor of English in University College, London, 1839; and lecturer and assistant physician at Middlesex Hospital. He published "Norway and the Norwegians" (1840), "The English Language" (1841), "An Elementary English Grammar" (1843), "A Handbook of the English Language" (1851), an edition of Johnson's "Dictionary," and numerous works on ethnology.

To the late Dr. Latham belongs the credit of having been the first to call in question the prevalent belief [with regard to the origin of the Aryans]. As early as 1851, in his edition of the Germania of Tacitus, he ventured to assert that no valid argument whatever had been produced in favour of the Asiatic origin of the Aryans. He maintained, on the other hand, that a European origin was far more probable. Taylor, Aryans, p. 20.

Lathbury (lath'bur-i), Thomas. Born at Brackley, Northamptonshire, 1798: died at Bristol, Feb. 11, 1865. An English ecclesiastical historian. Latimer (lat'i-mėr), Hugh. Born at Thurcaston, Leicestershire, about 1485: burned at Oxford, Oct. 16, 1555. A celebrated English prelate and reformer. He graduated B. A. at Cambridge in 1510; became a priest; rose in favor at court, especially with Cromwell, and obtained the benefice of West Kington (or Kineton), Wiltshire; was cited to appear before the Bishop of London on a charge of heresy Jan. 29, 1532; recanted April 10; was made a royal chaplain 1534, and bishop of Worcester 1535; and resigned his bishopric July 1, 1539, on account of his opposition to the Act of the Six Articles (by his own account at the request of the king). He was ordered into the custody of the Bishop of Chichester, but was soon released. During the reign of Edward VI. he regained his influence at court, and identified himself more closely with the Reformation. On the accession of Mary he was arrested and committed to the Tower (Sept., 1553); was sent to Oxford with Ridley and Cranmer to defend their doctrines regarding the mass before the divines of the two universities, March, 1554; was excommunicated April 20; and was burned with Ridley "at the ditch over against Balliol College," Oct. 16, 1555.

Lautaro (lou-tä'rō) Society. [Sp. Sociedad de Lautaro.] A secret political society, originally established in various Spanish cities during the first years of the 19th century. It was affiliated with the Gran Reunion Americana (which see), and had for its aim the emancipation of Spanish South America. The first American branch (called the Lautaro Lodge) was formed at Buenos Ayres, by San Martin and others, about July, 1812. In Jan., 1813, it obtained practical control of the government at Buenos Ayres, and during the succeeding years, until about 1823, was the hidden moving spring of nearly all political action on the patriot side.

The Lodge of Lautaro was not a machine of government or of speculative propaganda, it was an engine of revolution, of war against a common enemy and of defense against internal dangers. Under its auspices was created the first popular assembly which gave form to the sovereignty of the people; to it was due that spirit of propaganda which characterized the Argentine revolution, and the maintenance of the alliance with Chile, which gave independence to half the continent.

In May, 1716, he, with others, founded the Banque Générale, and succeeded in carrying out with success his views with regard to paper currency, his notes being accepted in payment of taxes, and commanding a premium over specie. Soon after this he acquired from the French government control of the territory then called "Louisiana" for colonization and trade, the "Compagnie d'Occident" being incorporated for this purpose in 1717: an enterprise which became famous under the name of "The Mississippi Scheme" or "The System." This company soon absorbed the East India and China companies (being thereafter known as the "Compagnie des Indes"), the African Company, the mint, and the power of receivers-general, thus becoming supreme both in the American and Asiatic commerce of France and in its internal financial affairs. Meanwhile, in 1718, the "Banque Générale" had been transformed into the "Banque Royale," with Law as director-general and its notes guaranteed by the king. On Jan. 5, 1720, Law was made controller-general of finance, and on Feb. 23 the company and the bank were combined. For a while the "System" prospered, fortunes were made in speculation, and Law possessed great power; but the overissue of paper money and the hostile action of the government brought on the catastrophe, and in May, 1720, the "System" collapsed. Law was driven from France and his estates were confiscated. In Dec., 1720, however, he was invited by the czar Peter to take charge of the finances of Russia, but declined. Later (1721) he returned to England, remaining there until 1725, when he went to Italy.

Lear (lēr), also Leir, Lir, and Leyr. A mythical king of Britain. See the extracts, and King Lear.

"Lir" was another Ocean-god who was worshipped both in Ireland and Britain. He appears in the Irish romance on "the fate of the Children of Lir" as a king of the divine race whose children were turned into swans by enchantment: "and the men of Erin were grieved at their departure, and they made a law and proclaimed it throughout the land, that no one should kill a swan in Erin from that time forth." In the Welsh histories he appears as "Lear." According to the version in Geoffrey of Monmouth's history, which Shakespeare adopted as the framework of his tragedy, King Lear built the town of Leicester about the time when Amos was a prophet in Israel; and his daughter Cordelia is represented as burying him in a vault under the River Sore, which had been originally built as a Temple of Janus. Elton, Origins of Eng. Hist., p. 279.

After the death of Brutus the author of Perceforest drags us through the history of his numerous descendants. One of these monarchs is King Leyr, whose story was first related of a Roman emperor in the Gesta Romanorum, and was afterwards told of the British monarch in the Chronicle of Geoffrey of Monmouth. These works were the origin of Shakspeare's celebrated tragedy, which, however, differs so far from them that both in Geoffrey's Chronicle and Perceforest the events have a happy conclusion, as Cordelia defeats her sisters and reinstates her father on the throne. From Perceforest the tale had found its way into Fabyan's "Concordance of Histories," written in the time of Henry VII., and thence passed into various lamentable ballads of the death of King Leyr and his three daughters, of which the catastrophe probably suggested to Shakspeare the tragic termination which he has given to his drama. The story of King Lear is also in the fifteenth chapter of the third book of Warner's "Albion's England," and in Spenser's "Faery Queen" (book 2, canto 10), where, in conformity with the romance and chronicle, the war against the sisters has a successful termination:

> "So to his crown she restored him again,
> In which he dyde, made ripe for death by eld."

Leatherstocking. A name given to Natty Bumpo in some of Cooper's novels, which are hence called the "Leatherstocking novels." He is also called Hawkeye, the Trapper, the Pathfinder, and the Deerslayer.

In "The Pioneers," "The Last of the Mohicans," "The Prairie," "The Pathfinder," and "The Deerslayer" figures the character of Leatherstocking, than whom no fictitious personage has a greater claim to interest. His bravery, resolution, and woodland skill make him a type of the hardy race who pushed westward the reign of civilization.

Lebanon (leb′a-non). [Heb., 'the white.'] The lofty mountain-range in the southern part of Syria, which runs on its western skirts from northeast by north to southeast by south, and extends in one unbroken dorsal ridge to a distance of more than 100 miles: the classical Libanus, and the el-Libnan of the Arabs. It is bounded on the north by the Nahr el-Kebir (the classical Eleutherus) near Tripolis and Homs. Its highest summits rise in the north. Beginning with the Jebel el-Akra (4,500 feet), it rises till it attains near Beirut and Tripolis in the Jebel el-Machmal the height of 10,016 feet, and in the Dahr el-Kodib 10,052 feet, which is overtowered by the Timarun (10,539 feet). At the height of 7,500 feet the French built in 1863 a post-road leading from Beirut to Damascus. From this pass the mountain gradually slopes down to the valley of the Litany. Lebanon consists mainly of limestone. It is cut through by many gorges, ravines, and glens, with here and there tremendous chasms and precipices that descend for nearly a thousand feet. The peaks of the Mach-mal and Kodih are clothed with snow eight months in the year, while in the ravines the snow never melts. From these snow-peaks the name of the mountain is derived. Of the chief ornament of Lebanon in ancient time, the cedars, there still exist small groups on many places in the mountain, the largest consisting of about 350 trees, at the foot of the Machmal. Lebanon is still covered with industrious villages and monasteries, and adorned with gardens of olives, dates, figs, mulberries, and other fruit-trees. It exhibits the greatest variety in its climatic conditions and the character of its soil, so that an Arabian poet has said of it: "The winter is upon its head, the spring upon its shoulders, the autumn in its bosom, and at its feet slumbers the summer." Lebanon is inhabited by Mohammedans, Druses, and Maronite Christians. Opposite Lebanon on the east side is Anti-Lebanon or Anti-Libanus (which see). Between the two ranges is inclosed the great and fertile valley of Bik'ah, called by the Greeks and Romans Cœle-Syria ('hollow Syria'), cut through by the rivers Asi and Litany (the classical Orontes and Leontes), and containing the city of Baalbec, with its magnificent ruins. In the Assyrian inscriptions Lebanon is mentioned by the name of Libnânu as the chief source from which the Assyrian kings procured costly woods for their buildings.

It has been said that the glory of Delille as the greatest poet of the last quarter of the century was shared by a writer whom his contemporaries surnamed (absurdly enough) Pindar. Escouchard Lebrun had a strange resemblance to J. B. Rousseau, of whom, however, he was by no means a warm admirer. Like his forerunner, he divided his time between bombastic lyrics and epigrams of very considerable merit. Lebrun was not destitute of a certain force, but his time was too much for him.

The university, founded in 1409 on the secession of German students from the University of Prague, ranks as the second or third in size of the German universities. It has about 3,000 students, and a library of over 500,000 volumes. The city is the seat of the supreme courts of the empire. It was the birthplace of Leibnitz and of Richard Wagner. Leipsic was an ancient Slavic settlement. It received privileges from the Margrave of Meissen in the 12th century, and developed into a great commercial center in the later middle ages; was besieged and taken in the Thirty Years' War; was the scene of riots in 1848–49; and was occupied by the Prussians 1866. (For battles fought here, see below.) Population (1900), with incorporated suburbs, 455,089.

Leipsic, Battles of. 1. A victory gained Sept. 7 (O. S.), 1631, by the Swedes and Saxons under Gustavus Adolphus over the Imperialists under Tilly. Also called the first battle of Breitenfeld.—2. A victory gained Oct. 23 (O. S.), 1642, by the Swedes under Torstenson over the Imperialists under Leopold of Austria and Piccolomini. Also called the second battle of Breitenfeld.—3. A victory gained by the Prussians, Russians, Austrians, and Swedes (200,000 at first, 300,000 later) under Schwarzenberg over the French (about 180,000) under Napoleon, Oct. 16–19, 1813. The loss of the Allies is estimated at 54,000 killed and wounded; that of the French at 40,000 killed and wounded and 30,000 prisoners. The victory virtually secured the liberation of Germany. Also called "the Battle of the Nations" ("Volkerschlacht").

Leipsic Colloquy. A conference between Lutheran and Reformed theologians, held at Leipsic in 1631.

Leipsic Disputation. A theological controversy between Luther and Karlstadt on one side and Eck on the other, held at Leipsic June 27–July 15, 1519.

Lemaître (lè-mātr′), Frédéric. Born at Havre, France, July 21, 1800: died at Paris, Jan. 26, 1876. A noted French actor. He studied two years at the Conservatoire, but made his first public appearance on four feet as the lion in a poor melodrama, "Pyrame et Thisbé," owing to the fact that the Odéon refused to engage him though he was backed by Talma. He made slow progress, but in 1823, being cast for the melodramatic part of Robert Macaire in a tame play in which he feared he could make no impression, he conceived the idea of playing it as a comic part. From this time his success as a comedian was complete. He was considered in France the greatest dramatic artist of his time, with the exception of Talma. His play "Robert Macaire," with Saint-Amand and Antier, was played over five hundred times in succession.

One of the so-called cyclic poets, author of an epic entitled "The Little Iliad" ('Ιλιὰς μικρά), in four books. It was designed to be a supplement to the Iliad of Homer, and related the events which followed the death of Hector—namely, the fate of Ajax, the exploits of Ulysses, the fall of Troy, the Lescot (les-kō'), Pierre. Born at Paris about 1510: died Sept. 10, 1578. A noted French architect. About all that is known of his personal history is derived from a poem by Ronsard, and the accounts of the royal buildings. He was practically the first architect of France to employ the classic forms in a truly classic way, previous attempts being largely influenced by Gothic feeling. His work is considered the best that the Renaissance produced in France. He was made architect of the Louvre Aug. 3, 1546, and retained the office as long as he lived. That part of the Louvre which was built by Lescot consists of the western side south of the Tour d'Orloge, which stands upon the foundations of the great hall of Philippe Auguste, and, with a lower roof, remains just as Lescot left it; the Pavillon du Roi, remodeled; and the western half of the south side, also remodeled. It is the oldest portion of the present palace, and has furnished the type which has been followed throughout the building.

Leslie (les′li or lez′li), Alexander, first Earl of Leven. Born about 1580: died at Balgonie, Fifeshire, April 4, 1661. A Scottish general, long in the service of Charles IX. of Sweden, and Gustavus Adolphus, in the campaigns against Russia, Poland, Denmark, and Austria. In 1628 he compelled Wallenstein to raise the siege of Stralsund, and in 1630 seized the island of Rügen for the Swedish king. He was made field-marshal in 1636. He returned to Scotland, and identified himself with the Covenanters, resigning from the Swedish service in 1638. The organization and command of the Scottish army were intrusted to him. He captured Aberdeen and Edinburgh Castle in 1639, but resigned in June of that year in order that there might be no obstacle to the proposed peace with Charles. On the rupture of the peace, he resumed his position as general (April, 1640). In 1644 he led an army into England to support the Parliament, and took part in the battle of Marston Moor, where the troops under his command were routed. (See Marston Moor.) He was relieved of his command May 11, 1648, but assumed it again in 1648 when Cromwell threatened Scotland. In 1651 he was surprised and captured by a body of English horse, carried to London, and imprisoned in the Tower, from which he was soon released.

Leslie, or Lesley, Charles. Born at Dublin, Ireland, July 17, 1650: died at Glaslough, Monaghan, Ireland, April 13, 1722. A British nonjuror (Jacobite) and controversialist. He was an opponent of William III. whom he attacked in a pamphlet "Gallienus Redivivus, or Murther will out" (1695: a principal authority on the Glencoe massacre), of Burnet ("Tempora mutantur," 1689), Tillotson, and others. He also attacked the Quakers ("The Snake in the Grass, or Satan transformed into an Angel of Light" (1696), and other pamphlets) and the Jews, and engaged in political controversies. His best-known work is "A Short and Easy Method with the Deists" (1698). He was obliged to leave England (1711) to avoid arrest on account of his political opinions, and later joined the household of the Pretender, whom he ardently supported.

Leslie, Charles Robert. Born at London, Oct. 19, 1794: died there, May 5, 1859. A noted English painter and writer, son of Robert Leslie, an American. He went to America with his parents in 1799, returned to England in 1811 to study art, and became a pupil of Allston and West, and a close friend of Constable. In 1833 he was for a brief period instructor of drawing at West Point. He was professor of painting at the Royal Academy 1848–52. Among his works are numerous portraits (Washington Irving, Scott, Dickens as Bobadil, etc.), "Sir Roger de Coverley going to Church" (1819), "Among the Gypsies" (1829), illustrations of Irving's "Sketch-book" and "Knickerbocker," "May-day Revels in the Time of Queen Elizabeth" (1821), "The Taming of the Shrew" (1831), "Columbus and the Egg" (1835), etc. He wrote "Memoirs of John Constable" (1845), "Handbook for Young Painters" (1855), "Autobiographical Recollections" (edited by Taylor, 1865), "Life of Reynolds" (completed by Taylor, 1865).

Leslie, David. Died 1682. A Scottish general, first Lord Newark. He was colonel of horse under Gustavus Adolphus, but returned to Scotland in 1640 to support the cause of the Covenanters, and was appointed major-general in the Scottish army under the Earl of Leven. At the battle of Marston Moor, in which the troops under Leven were routed by Rupert, he with Cromwell stood firm, and won the day. His part in the victory, which was ignored by Cromwell, has been much discussed, but it was certainly an important one. On Sept. 13, 1645, he defeated Montrose. He later supported the cause of Charles II., and was defeated by Cromwell at Dunbar Sept. 3, 1650, and again at Worcester. He was captured and confined in the Tower until 1660. After the Restoration he was created Lord Newark.

Leslie, Eliza. Born at Philadelphia, Nov., 1787: died at Gloucester, N. J., Jan. 2, 1858. An American authoress, sister of C. R. Leslie: published "Domestic Cookery Book" (1837), etc.

Leslie, Frank (the assumed name of Henry Carter). Born at Ipswich, England, 1821: died at New York, Jan. 10, 1880. An American publisher, founder (1855) of "Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper."

Leslie, or Lesley, John. Born Sept. 29, 1527: died at Guirtenburg, near Brussels, May 30, 1596. A Scottish Roman Catholic prelate and historian, bishop of Ross, a partizan and influential adviser of Mary Queen of Scots, and her agent in many affairs during her imprisonment. He was involved in the Norfolk conspiracy, and was confined in the Tower, and later transferred to Farnham Castle. In 1573 he was released. He wrote a history of Scotland, partly in Latin (1578) and partly in Scotch (published 1830), and various other works.

Leslie, Sir John. Born at Largo, Fifeshire, Scotland, April 16, 1766: died at Coates, near Largo, Nov. 3, 1832. A Scottish physicist and geometrician, made professor of mathematics at Edinburgh 1805. He wrote an "Inquiry into the Nature and Properties of Heat" (1804), "Elements of Geometry" (1809), "Geometrical Analysis" (1821), "Elements of Physics" (1823), etc.

Leslie, Thomas Edward Cliffe. Born in Ireland, 1827: died at Belfast, Ireland, Jan. 27, 1882. A British political economist. He was appointed professor of jurisprudence and political economy in Queen's College, Belfast, in 1853. He wrote "Land Systems and Industrial Economy of Ireland, England, and Continental Countries" (1870), "Essays on Political and Moral Philosophy" (1879), etc.

Lesly, Ludovic. In Scott's "Quentin Durward," an archer of Louis XI.'s body-guard, called Le Balafré from a scar on his face.

Lespinasse (lā-pi-näs′), Mademoiselle Julie Jeanne Eléonore de. Born at Lyons (baptized Nov. 19, 1732): died at Paris, May 22, 1776. A French letter-writer and leader of society. She was the illegitimate daughter of the Countess d'Albon. In 1754 Madame du Deffand, who had become blind, invited her to live with her. For ten years they presided together over their fashionable and literary salon. At the end of that time they quarreled, and Mademoiselle Lespinasse established herself elsewhere with D'Alembert, who lived with her in a curious sort of relationship till her death.

During this time she was a gracious hostess, and a bond of union to many men of letters, especially those of the younger philosophe school. But this is not what gives her her place here. Her claim rests upon a collection of love-letters, not addressed to D'Alembert. She was thirty-four when the earliest of her love affairs began, and had never been beautiful. When she died she was forty-four, and her later letters are more passionate than the earlier. Her first lover was a young Spaniard, the Marquis Gonsalvo de Mora; her second, the Count de Guibert, a poet and essayist of no great merit, a military reformer said to have been of some talent, and pretty evidently a bad-hearted coxcomb. To him the epistles we have are addressed.

Lesseps (les′eps; F. pron. le-seps′), Vicomte Ferdinand de. Born at Versailles, France, Nov. 19, 1805: died near Paris, Dec. 7, 1894. A celebrated French engineer and diplomatist. He was ambassador at Madrid in 1848, and was sent on a special mission to Rome in 1849. He is chiefly known as the projector and engineer of the Suez Canal, work on which was commenced in 1859, and which was opened in 1869. He afterward formed a company for the purpose of cutting a canal through the Isthmus of Panama, and work on the canal began in 1881. The scheme collapsed, and a judicial inquiry into the affairs of the company resulted in a sentence of imprisonment against De Lesseps in 1893, which was not carried into effect. He published "Lettres, etc., pour servir à l'histoire du canal de Suez" (1875). See Suez Canal, Panama Canal.

Lessines (les-sēn′). A town in the province of Hainaut, Belgium, situated on the Dender 26 miles west-southwest of Brussels. Population (1890), 8,225.

Lessing (les′sing), Gotthold Ephraim. Born at Camenz, Upper Lusatia, Jan. 22, 1729: died at Brunswick, Feb. 15, 1781. A celebrated German dramatist and critic. His father was a clergyman. He attended school at Camenz and Meissen, and in 1746 went to Leipsic to study theology. Instead, however, of pursuing his studies in this direction, he soon gave his principal attention to the theater. In 1748, in his third semester at the university, was produced his first comedy, "Der junge Gelehrte" ("The Young Scholar"). His association with the theater having given offense to his parents, he was summoned home. He soon, nevertheless, returned to Leipsic, where he matriculated as a student of medicine. This same year (1748) he went to Berlin, where he supported himself by making translations and writing criticisms, reviews, and original work. In 1751 he went to Wittenberg to complete his studies at the university. After taking the degree of master, he returned to Berlin in 1752. In 1751 he had already published a collection of poems under the title "Kleinigkeiten" ("Trifles"). In 1753 he began the publication of his collected works, two volumes of which were issued that year, two in 1754, and two more in 1755, in which year he also wrote his first tragedy, "Miss Sara Sampson." Several comedies fall in this early period, namely, "Der Misogyn" ("The Misogynist"), "Die Juden" ("The Jews"), "Der Freigeist" ("The Freethinker"), "Der Schatz" ("The Treasure"). He had also written a number of Anacreontic poems, poetic fables, epigrams, and didactic poems. In the autumn of 1755 he returned once more to Leipsic, where with slight interruptions he remained until 1757. In 1758 he went back to Berlin, and began there the following year, in conjunction with Moses Mendelssohn and the bookseller Nicolai, his "Litteraturbriefe" ("Letters on Literature"), which were continued down to 1765. He published too, at this time, a collection of prose fables, a number of odes in prose, and the one-act tragedy "Philotas," and sketched the plan of a "Faust," which, however, was never written. In 1760 he went to Breslau as secretary to General von Tauentzien. In 1763 he wrote the comedy "Minna von Barnhelm," which was not published until 1767. From Breslau he returned in 1765 to Berlin, where he next wrote his great critical work "Laokoon," which was published in 1766. The succeeding year he went to Hamburg in order to take part as a critic in the foundation of a German national theater. The result of this undertaking was the series of dramatic criticisms published twice a week from 1767 to 1769 under the title "Hamburgische Dramaturgie" ("Hamburg Dramaturgy"). In 1768 appeared "Briefe antiquarischen Inhalts" ("Antiquarian Letters"), directed against Professor Klotz of Halle. In 1769 appeared the archæological treatise "Wie die Alten den Tod gebildet" ("How the Ancients depicted Death"). In this year he received a call as librarian to the ducal library in Wolfenbüttel, a position which he held from the spring of 1770 until his death. In 1772 appeared the tragedy "Emilia Galotti." From 1773 to 1781 were published a series of "Contributions to History and Literature from the Treasures of the Wolfenbüttel Library" ("Beiträge zur Geschichte und Literatur aus den Schätzen der Wolfenbüttel. Bibliothek"), "Fragmente eines Wolfenbüttelschen Ungenannten," theological criticisms purporting to be extracts from the writings of "an anonymous Wolfenbütteler," but really written by the Hamburg professor and philosop Reimarus, published from 1774 to 1778, involved bitter controversy with Pastor Goeze of Hamburg him he wrote the scathing polemics contained in Goeze," which appeared also in 1778. This was published "Ernst und Falk, Gespräche maurer" ("Ernst and Falk, Dialogues for Free In 1779 appeared the drama "Nathan der Weise" the Wise"), and in 1780, finally, the treatise "hung des Menschengeschlechts" ("The Educat Human Race")—like the "Anti-Goeze" papers than," a result of the theological controversies years of his life. Liber de Hyda (lī'bėr dē hī'dä). See the ex- tract.

A circumstantial account of the foundation of the schools of Oxford in the year 886 is to be found in the Liber de Hyda, a monastic record which seems to have been compiled dur- ing the second half of the fourteenth century. It professes to give a list of the original staff of teachers. St. Neot and St. Grimbald are stated to have given lectures on theology, Asser on grammar and rhetoric, John, a monk of St. David's, on logic, music, and arithmetic, and another monk of the same name, on geometry and astronomy. The absence of any allusion to lectures on medicine or law may be due to the fact that the compiler of the Liber de Hyda was a monk who, as such, had no interest in either of these branches of study. He shows himself singularly inaccurate as to the history of Oxford in his own century, for he states posi- tively that the University had its abode outside the North Gate until the year 1354, and used the church of St. Giles as its formal place of assembly. Lyte, Oxford, p. 241.

Liberia (lī-bē'ri-ä). A negro republic on the western coast of Africa, extending from about 6° 40' W. about 400 miles along the coast to the northwest. Capital, Monrovia. The coast is low. Tropical products are exported. The government is vested in a president and a congress comprising a senate and a house of representatives. Liberia was founded by free negroes sent by the American Colonization Society in 1822, and was declared independent in 1847. Area, estimated, 57,000 square miles. Population, estimated, 1,068,000.

Liber Pontificalis (lī'bėr pon-tif-i-kā'lis). [L., 'book of the Pope.'] A work containing the lives of the popes from St. Peter to Stephen VI. It has been attributed to Anastasius Bibliothecarius, but without ancient authority.

Liberty Bell, The. A famous bell cast in Lon- don in 1752. It bore the motto "Proclaim liberty throughout the land unto all the inhabitants thereof." It was afterward recast at Philadelphia, with the same in- scription, and it was rung when the Declaration of Independence was adopted by Congress. It is now in Independence Hall in Philadelphia.

Liberty Enlightening the World. A colossal figure formed of plates of bronze on an iron framework, supported on a high granite pedes- tal, on Bedloe's Island in New York Bay. The figure represents a robustly formed woman, fully draped in Greek tunic and mantle, and diademed, holding a torch in her uplifted right hand. The height of the statue is 151 feet; of the pedestal, 155. It is by the sculptor Bar- tholdi, and is a gift made to the United States by popular subscription by the people of France. The pedestal was designed by Richard M. Hunt, and paid for by popular sub- scription in the United States. The statue was inaugurated in 1886.

Liberty Party. In United States politics, an antislavery party, founded 1839–40. It opposed the annexation of Texas, and nominated James G. Birney for President of the United States in 1840, and again in 1844, when he polled 62,263 votes. This vote incidentally caused the defeat of Henry Clay and the election of James K. Polk.

Liberty Tree, The. An elm-tree formerly stand- ing on Washington street, Boston. Effigies of ob- jectionable persons were hung upon it during the Stamp Act excitement. A building now covers its site.

Libra (lī'brä). [L., 'the balance.'] An ancient zodiacal constellation, representing an ordi- nary pair of scales. This constellation was not com- monly used among the Greeks, its place being occupied by the Chelæ, or Scorpion's Claws. It is found, however, in all the Egyptian zodiacs going back to 600 B. C.; but there is reason to believe that it is not so old as the rest of the zodiac (that is, 2,000 years or more B. C.). Its principal stars, Kiffa borealis and Kiffa australis, 2.7 and 3.0 mag- nitudes respectively, are at the base of an isosceles triangle of which Antares forms the vertex.

Libreville (lēbr-vēl'). The capital of French Kongo, about 32 miles north of the equator, on the Bay of Gaboon. It consists of the French town, where the government buildings, the hospital, and the Catholic mission attract attention, and of the suburbs Glasstown and Baraka, where foreign traders reside and American Presbyterians have their mission station. The nucleus of the native population was formed by a settle- ment of liberated slaves.

Libro de Tasas (lē'brō dā tä'säs). [Sp., 'book of rules' or 'laws.'] A code of laws and regu- lations compiled under the direction of the vice- roy Toledo for the government of Peru. They were promulgated at different times, the first instalment being dated Oct. 18, 1572. The Libro de Tasas was founded partly on the unwritten Inca laws, partly on ancient Spanish legislation, and partly on rules established by the Council of the Indies. The country was divided into corregimientos (abolished in 1784); the duties of officers were defined; and it was directed that the Indians should be governed by their own chiefs, subject to the viceroy. The mitta, or forced labor of the Indians, was confirmed and regulated. These rules were the basis of the Peruvian colonial laws, and to some extent of those of the republic.

Libro d'Oro (lē'brō dō'rō). [It., 'book of gold.'] 1. A roll or register of the noble families of a state or province, with the list of their estates; an institution of the Italian republics of the middle ages, the most famous being that of Ven- ice. Lichfield (lich'fēld). ['The field of the dead.'] A city in Staffordshire, England, 14 miles north by east of Birmingham. The cathedral is a large and impressive church, mostly of the 13th and 14th cen- turies. The exterior is marked by its three lofty spires, the central one built by Wren. The west front is covered, except the space taken by the great central window, with arcades forming niches for about 100 statues. The details of the ornament are of great beauty. The nave has a fine triforium; the choir has none. The Lady chapel terminates in a polygonal chevet, said to be the only example of this normal Pointed form in an English cathedral. The handsome 16th-century windows were brought from a convent near Liège. The cathedral measures 403 by 65 feet; length of transepts, 149; height of vault, 60; height of central spire, 260. There is an interesting oblong octagonal chapter-house. Lichfield was the birthplace of Samuel Johnson. It was made a bishopric about 656, and was an archbishopric for a few years at the close of the 8th century. It was besieged by the Parliament in 1643. It manufactures ale. Population (1891), 7,864.

Lichterfelde (liċh'ter-fel-de). A village 6 miles southwest of Berlin. It has a school for cadets.

Licinia gens (lī-sin'i-ă jenz). A celebrated plebeian clan or house, of uncertain origin, in ancient Rome. The first member of the gens who obtained the consulship was C. Licinius Calvus Stolo, 364 B. C. The Licinii almost constantly occupied high offices of state until in the 4th century they obtained the imperial dignity. Their family names are Calvus (with the agnomens Esquilinus and Stolo), Crassus (with the agnomen Dives), Geta, Lucullus, Macer, Murena, Nerva, Sacerdos, Varus. The following cognomens are more in the nature of personal surnames than family names: Archias, Cæcina, Damasippus, Imbrex, Lartius, Lenticulus, Nepos, Proculus, Regulus, Rufinus, Squillus, and Tegula.

Licinian (lī-sin'i-ăn) Laws or Rogations. A collection of laws proposed by the Roman tribunes Licinius Stolo and Sextius 376 B. C., and passed 367 after a long obstructive contest. They provided that one of the consuls must be a plebeian; that no person could occupy more than 500 jugera of the public land; that interest on debts should be deducted from the principal and the balance paid in three years; and that plebeians should be admitted to the College of the Sibylline Books. There were provisions limiting the cattle on the public lands and limiting the slave labor on large estates.

Licinius (lī-sin'i-us) (Caius Licinius Calvus Stolo). A Roman tribune who proposed the Licinian Laws (which see).

Licinius (Caius Flavius Valerius Licinianus). Born in Dacia: killed at Thessalonica, 324 A. D. A Roman emperor. He was made Augustus by Galerius in 307. In 313 he married Constantia, sister of Constantine the Great. He defeated Maximinus in the same year, whereby he became sole ruler of the East. In 314 he became involved in war with Constantine, who had made himself sole ruler of the West. Peace was shortly concluded, but a new war begun in 323 ended in his defeat and death.

Lie (lē), Jonas Lauritz Edemil. Born at Eger, near Drammen, Norway, Nov. 6, 1833. A Norwegian novelist. He entered the naval academy at Frederiksværn, but a year later was forced to give up this career because of near-sightedness. Subsequently he studied jurisprudence at Christiania, and ultimately settled at Kongsvinger in the practice of his profession. Here he also found time for journalistic work, and made frequent contributions to journals and periodicals. In 1864 appeared a first collection of poems. In 1865 he removed to Christiania in order to devote himself wholly to literature. His first novel, "Den Fremsynte" ("The Foreseer"), appeared in 1870. With government assistance he now spent a summer in travel in the north, the fruit of which was "Fortællinger og Skildringer fra Norze" ("Tales and Descriptions of Norway"), and then was enabled to undertake a journey to Rome. His next novel, "Tremasteren Fremtiden eller Liv nordpaa" ("The Bark Future, or Life up North," 1872), was a description of Norse life at sea, the direction in which he has made his particular fame. This was followed in 1874 by his most widely known novel, "Lodsen og hans Hustru" ("The Pilot and his Wife"). Results of his Italian journey were "Fanfulla," "Antonio Banniera," and the lyrical drama "Faustina Strozzi" (all from 1875). "Thomas Ross" (1878) and "Adam Schrader" (1879) are novels of city life. "Rutland" (1881) is a sea story. A three-act comedy, "Grabowa Kat," was successfully produced in Christiania and Stockholm. Of late years he has lived much abroad (alternately in Stuttgart, Berchtesgaden, and Dresden), but has recently again taken up his residence in Norway.

Li Hung Chang (lē hŏng chăng). Born about 1823 in the province of Anhwei: died at Peking, Nov. 7, 1901. A noted Chinese statesman, known as "the Bismarck of Asia." He joined General Gordon in opposing the T'ai-p'ing rebellion against Tatar rule: they were successful, both receiving the yellow jacket and the three-eyed peacock's feather, the highest orders bestowed by the emperors. He was appointed viceroy of Chi-li province and senior grand secretary of state in 1870, remaining the intermediary between China and the world at large until the beginning of the war with Japan. With the first reverses of the war of 1894, on the Chinese side, his enemies prevailed upon the emperor to strip him of his highest decorations, and, later, he was obliged to share the command of the army with Prince Kung, the emperor's uncle. Later still he and Prince Kung were superseded in command of the army by Liu-kun-yi, an enemy of Li. But at the close of the war, after ineffectual efforts by others, Li Hung Chang was made the high commissioner for China, with absolute powers, and brought about an agreement for peace between his country and Japan. He was the organizer of the only body of modern soldiers China employed, the founder of her navy of modern ships, the builder of her first railway. The faults of the Chinese army for which he was degraded early in the war were due to the weakness and ignorance of the Tsung-li-yamen, the board which conducted the war, and to which Viceroy Li was subordinated. He was prime minister of China 1895–98. He visited Europe and the United States in 1896. In July, 1900, he was appointed governor of Chi-li, and played an important part in the negotiations which accompanied and followed the siege of the legations. He was one of the Chinese peace commissioners.

At the battle of Brentford he was taken prisoner, and was subsequently tried for treason, but was exchanged in 1643, and became (1644) lieutenant-colonel of dragoons. He was several times imprisoned and fined for scandalous attacks on persons of authority, and finally tried for sedition. Notwithstanding his acquittal, he was transferred to the Tower, thence to Elizabeth Castle, Guernsey, and from there to Dover Castle (Oct., 1655). He became a Quaker, and shortly after that Cromwell released him. He wrote a large number of controversial pamphlets.

Lincoln. The capital of Lincolnshire, England, situated on the Witham in lat. 53° N., long. 0° 33′ W.: the Roman Lindum Colonia, or simply Lindum. The cathedral is a building, founded in the 11th century, but rebuilt at the end of the 12th and the first half of the 13th. The interior is characterized by its 3 square towers — the central tower 262 feet high, and the 2 of the west front 200 feet high. The west front has 3 great arches corresponding to the nave and aisles, around which and in front of towers is built a wide arcaded screen flanked by turrets. The gable between the towers is very richly ornamented. The portals are Norman. The square east end and the general elevations, with their double transepts, are examples of fine and beautiful Early English. The imposing interior is for the most part Early English. The choir, inclosed by a Decorated screen, is Early English except the 5 easternmost bays (established 1280), which constitute the celebrated Angel Choir, so called from its sculptured figures of angels. The chapter-house is one of the 14th century. The dimensions of the cathedral are 480 by 80 feet; length of western transepts, 222; height of vaulting, 82. The cloister and chapter-house are of the 13th century. The city contains many fine old buildings of interest. It has some trade and manufactures agricultural implements. It was important in Roman and Saxon periods, and was a chief town in Danelagh. Stephen captured its castle, and was besieged near it by partizans of Matilda in 1141. Lincoln, Abraham. Born in Hardin County, Ky., Feb. 12, 1809: died at Washington, April 15, 1865. The sixteenth President of the United States. He was descended from a family of English origin, residing in the middle 18th century in Berks County, Pennsylvania. His father emigrated from Virginia to Kentucky about 1780. His father, Thomas Lincoln, settled with his family in Indiana in 1816, and in Illinois in 1830. His mother was Nancy Hanks, Thomas Lincoln's first wife. He left his father's home soon after settling in Illinois, and followed various occupations, including those of a woodborer, a salesman, a merchant, and a surveyor, was admitted to the bar in 1836, and began the practice at Springfield in 1837. He served first as a captain afterward as a private in the Black Hawk war in 1832. A Whig member of the Illinois State legislature 1834–41, and was a Whig member of Congress from Illinois 1847–49. In 1858, as Republican candidate for United States senator, he held a series of joint discussions with Stephen A. Douglas, in which he took a pronounced stand against the institution of slavery. This debate attracted the attention of the country, and in 1860 he was nominated as candidate for President by the Republican party. The division of the Democratic party secured for him an easy victory. He received 180 electoral votes against 72 for John C. Breckenridge, candidate of the Southern Democracy, 39 for John Bell, candidate of the Constitutional Union party, and 12 for Stephen A. Douglas, candidate of the Northern Democrats; and was inaugurated on March 4, 1861. His election was the signal for the secession, one after another, of the slave States of the South, and for the organization of the Confederate States (which see). Hostilities began with an attack by the Secessionists of South Carolina on the Federal troops at Fort Sumter, April 12, 1861. The fort surrendered on the 13th. On the 15th a call was issued by the President for 75,000 volunteers, and assumed control of events passed from the cabinet to the camp (see Civil War.) He proclaimed a blockade of the Confederate ports April 19, 1861; and Sept. 22, 1862, issued a proclamation emancipating all slaves in States or parts of States which should be in rebellion on Jan. 1, 1863. He was re-elected president by the Republican party in 1864, receiving 212 electoral votes against 21 for George B. McClellan, candidate of the Democratic party. He began his second term of office March 4, 1865. He entered Richmond with the Federal army April 4, 1865, two days after the flight of the Confederate government; and was occupied with plans for the reconstruction of the South when he was assassinated by John Wilkes Booth at Ford's Theater, Washington, April 14, 1865, and died on the following day. Numerous biographies of Lincoln have been published, the most comprehensive of which is that by J. G. Nicolay and John Hay (1890).

Linus (lī′nus). [Gr. Λίνος.] An exclamation of grief or lamentation, of Eastern origin, personified in ancient Greek poetry through ignorance of its meaning.

> The words were carried across the western sea to men of an alien race and language. "Cry ailinon, ailinon! woe, woe!" says the Greek poet of Athens, and already in Homeric days the dirge was attributed to a mythic Linos whose tragic fate was commemorated in its opening words: "O Linos, Linos!" Linos, however, had no existence except in a popular etymology; the Greek ailinos is in reality the Phœnician aîlênu, "alas for us!" with which the lamentations for the death of the divine Adônis were wont to begin. Sayce, Anc. Babylonians, p. 228.

Locke, John. Born at Wrington, Somerset, Aug. 29, 1632: died at Oates, High Laver, Essex, Oct. 28, 1704. A celebrated English philosopher, one of the most influential thinkers of modern times. His father was a lawyer, and a captain in the Parliamentary army. Locke was educated at Westminster School (of which Busby was head-master), and at Christ Church, Oxford, where he graduated in Feb., 1656. He continued to reside at Oxford, and was for brief periods lecturer on Greek, lecturer on rhetoric, and censor of moral philosophy. In Dec., 1665, and Jan., 1666, he accompanied Sir Walter Vane as secretary on a mission to the Elector of Brandenburg. On his return he again went to Oxford to study medicine, but did not take a degree. In 1667 he became a member of the family of the (later) Earl of Shaftesbury, at first as physician and afterward as confidential agent. In 1669 he drew up a constitution for the colonists of Carolina, of which Shaftesbury (then Ashley) was one of the lords proprietors. Through his patron Locke was appointed secretary of presentations in 1672, and secretary of the council of trade 1673–75. He visited France in 1672, and again 1675–79. After the fall of Shaftesbury, Locke became an object of suspicion, and found it necessary (1683) to escape to Holland where he remained until 1689. In this year he became commissioner of appeals. From 1691

he resided at Oates, High Laver, Essex, in the family of Sir Francis Masham. His chief work is the "Essay concerning Humane Understanding" (1690: four subsequent editions, revised by Locke, appeared 1694, 1695, 1700, 1706). Among his other writings are several letters "Concerning Toleration" (1689 (Latin and English), 1690), "Two Treatises on Government" (1690), "Some Thoughts concerning Education" (1693), etc. Various collective editions of his works have been published. Locke was the founder of the English and French "sensational" philosophy and psychology, and the skeptical application of his principles by David Hume led Kant to the development of the "critical" philosophy.

Lokeren (lō′ker-en). A town in the province of East Flanders, Belgium, situated on the Durme 23 miles northwest of Brussels. It has flourishing manufactures and trade. Population (1887), 19,667.

Loki (lō′kē). [ON.: lok, end; ljúka, lúka, to close, end.] In Old Norse mythology, the god of destruction. His father was the giant Farbauti (ON. Fárbauti), his mother Laufey or Nal (ON. Nál). By the giantess Angurboda (ON. Angrboda) he had 3 children: the Midgard-serpent, the Fenris-wolf, and Hel. Loki had throughout a twofold nature. He was of handsome appearance but of evil disposition, and was at the same time the friend and the enemy of the gods. For his evil deeds he was finally seized by the gods and bound. Over him was set a serpent whose poison would have fallen in drops upon his face had not his wife, Sigyn, caught them in a bowl. He was freed at Ragnarök, when he and Heimdall slew each other.

Lokman (lok-män′). [Ar. Luqmān, called "The Wise."] The reputed author of a collection of fables in Arabic. Luqman is the title of the 31st surah of the Koran, in the 11th verse of which are found the words "We gave to Luqman wisdom." To this shadowy character have been ascribed the circumstances and sayings of a number of men: hence Lokman has been represented as a nephew of Job or Abraham, a councilor of David or Solomon, Balaam, an ugly Ethiopian slave, a king of Yaman, a tailor, a carpenter, a shepherd. The fables are very like those of Æsop, and still more like those of Syntipas. Many are of Greek origin, and a number of them go back, as do the fables of Pilpay, to Indian originals. They were first put into their present form by an Egyptian Christian named Barsuma, probably toward the end of the 13th century. They were first edited (with a Latin translation) by Erpenius (Leyden, 1615). Recent editions are by Rödiger (2d ed. 1839) and Derenbourg (1850).

Lola Montez. See Gilbert, Marie D. E. R.

Lollards (lol′ärdz). [From MD. Lollaerd, one who mumbles prayers or hymns.] 1. A semi-monastic society for the care of the sick and the burial of the dead, which originated at Antwerp about 1300. Also called Cellites.—2. The English followers of Wyclif, adherents of a wide-spread movement, partly political and socialistic, and in some respects anticipating Protestantism and Puritanism, in the 14th and 15th centuries. They were also called Bible men, from their reverence for the Bible. They differed on some points both among themselves and from Wyclif, but in the main condemned the use of images in churches, pilgrimages to the tombs of saints, the temporal lordship of the clergy, the hierarchical organization, papal authority, religious orders, ecclesiastical decorations, the ceremony of the mass, the doctrine of transubstantiation, waging of wars, and capital punishment. Some of them engaged in seditious proceedings, and they were severely persecuted for more than a hundred years, especially after the adoption of a special statute ("De hæretico comburendo") against them in 1401. Lollards were very numerous at the close of the 14th century, and perhaps formed later part of the Lancastrian party in the Wars of the Roses.

Lolli (lōl′lē), Antonio. Born at Bergamo, Italy, about 1730: died in Sicily, 1802. A noted Italian violinist. He played with success in Stuttgart, St. Petersburg, Paris, and infrequently at London. "Owing to the eccentricity of his style of composition and execution, he was regarded as a madman by most of the audience." Burney, Hist. Music, IV. 680.

Lollius (lol′i-us). An unknown author from whom Chaucer professed to have derived various things in his poems. He seems to stand for Petrarch, Boccaccio, and others, and "occupies in English poetry very much the same position as Junius in English politics" (Lounsbury, Studies in Chaucer, II. 411).

Lolo (lō′lō), or Balolo (bä-lō′lō). A great Bantu nation of the Kongo State, occupying the basins of the Lulongo, Tshuapa, and Lomami rivers in the horseshoe bend of the Kongo River, between Lake Leopold and Stanley Falls.

L'Olonnois (lō-lo-nwä′), François. Died in Costa Rica about 1668. A French bucaneer and pirate, noted for his ferocity. He was transported to the West Indies for crimes, joined the bucaneers as a common sailor, rose to high command among them, and from 1660 ravaged the coasts of Central America. He was eventually wrecked, and was killed by Indians. His real name is supposed to have been Jacques Jean David Nau.

Lombard League. An association between Brescia, Bergamo, Mantua, Verona, Cremona, Treviso, and other cities of Lombardy and northern Italy, founded in 1167 for protection against Frederick Barbarossa. It rebuilt Milan, defeated Frederick at Legnano in 1176, and secured liberties by the peace of Constance in 1183. It was renewed against Frederick II. in 1226.

Lombardo (lom-bär′dō), Pietro. Died in 1515. A Venetian architect. The name Lombardo was the patronymic of many north Italian artists who flourished in Venice from the middle of the 15th to the beginning of the 16th century. It is associated with a large class of works peculiar to the early Renaissance in Venice. The most definite personality of the school is Pietro the architect, to whom are attributed two altars in the choir of San Marco (1462, 1471), the Church of Santa Maria dei Miracoli (begun in 1480), the monument to Dante (1482) at Ravenna, the Vendramini palace, the tomb of Doge Pietro Mocenigo in San Giovanni e Paolo, and the Moro chapel in San Giobbe. He was made director of public works March 15, 1499. The anonymous marbles which have been classed as belonging to the school of the Lombardi comprehend nearly all the Renaissance work produced about 1475–1550. Martino Lombardo is also noted as having built the Scuola di San Marco and the San Zaccaria in Venice. It is not known whether or not he was the son of Pietro. To the Lombardi family also belong Tullio, Antonio, and Giulio (sons of Pietro), Santi, and Moro. The last probably came from Bergamo.

Lombardo-Venetian Kingdom. A kingdom constituted by Austria in 1815 out of the Italian territories assigned to her by the Congress of Vienna. It comprises Lombardy, Venetia, and Mantua. Lombardy was ceded to Victor Emmanuel in 1859, and Venetia and Mantua were surrendered to him in 1866.

Lombards (lom′bärdz, formerly lum′bärdz). [Appar. 'long-beards.'] The natives or inhabitants of Lombardy in Italy. The name is used more specifically for the members of the Germanic tribe (Longobards) who about 568, under Alboin, conquered the part of northern Italy still called Lombardy, and founded the kingdom of that name, which was afterward extended over a much larger territory, and was finally overthrown by Charlemagne in 774. In old London the name Lombards was generic, and was applied to foreign merchants from southern Europe, but more especially to representatives of the great houses of the northern Italian cities. They also established themselves in France, chiefly at Nimes and Montpellier. See Lombard street.

Lombard street. A street in the City, London, where the Lombard merchants of the middle ages established themselves before the reign of Edward II. With the Germans of the Steelyard they engrossed the more profitable branches of English trade. The goldsmiths seem to have had the most ready money. On occasion they lent money on interest, and gradually took up the business of banking, as it was then understood. They did not call themselves bankers, but kept "running cashes" or current accounts. In 1677 there were no less than thirty-seven goldsmiths keeping "running cashes" in Lombard street. The seizure by Charles I. of £200,000 stored in the Tower forced them to keep their money in circulation, and was practically the origin of modern systematic banking. (Compare Lombards.) Lombard street is now a great banking center.

Lombardy (lom'bär-di). A Teutonic kingdom, founded in 568 by Alboin, which comprised at its height a large part of northern and central Italy. Its capital was Pavia. Various Lombard duchies (as Benevento) were founded further south in Italy. See Lombards.

Lombardy. [It. Lombarcia.] A compartimento in northern Italy. It includes the provinces Como, Milan, Pavia, Bergamo, Sondrio, Brescia, Cremona, and Mantua, comprising the alpine and subalpine regions in the north and the Lombard plain of the Po.

Lombardy. A theme (province) of the Byzantine empire, in the early part of the middle ages, situated in southeastern Italy.

Lombok, or Lomboc (lom-bok'). An island of the Lesser Sunda group, East Indies: the native Tanah Sasak. It is separated from Bali on the west by the Strait of Lombok, and from Sumbawa on the east by the Strait of Allas. The surface is generally mountainous. It is under native rulers, and the inhabitants are chiefly Sassaks (Mohammedan). Area, about 2,000 square miles.

Lombroso (lom-brō'zō), Cesar. Born at Venice, Nov., 1836. A noted Italian criminologist and alienist. Among his works are "The Criminal: an Anthropological and Medico-legal Study," "The Man of Genius," "Epileptic Insanity," "Political Crime and Revolutions," "The Physiognomy of the Anarchist," and "The Female Offender" with William Ferreri (1894).

Londinium (lon-din'i-um). The Roman name of London.

London (lun'don). [L. Londinium, origin uncertain; F. Londres, It. Londra, Sp. Lóndres.] The capital of England and seat of the government of the British empire, the largest and most important city in the world, and its principal business and financial center. It is situated in the counties of Middlesex, Surrey, and Kent, on both sides of the Thames, about 50 miles from its mouth, in lat. 51° 30′ 48″ N., long. 0° 5′ 48″ W. (St. Paul's Cathedral). In its widest extent (the Metropolitan Police District with the City of London Police District, which together form "Greater London") it occupies an area of 690 square miles and contains (1901), 6,581,372 inhabitants. Of these, according to the census of 1901, 4,536,541 reside within the "Inner Ring" (see County of London, below) or Registration District and 2,044,831 within the "Outer Ring" or suburban district. For administrative purposes this vast center of population is variously subdivided. The City of London proper (generally called "The City") is little over a square mile in extent, and had in 1901 a population of only 26,923. It extends along the north bank of the Thames from the Temple to the Tower, and northward as far as Holborn and Finsbury Circus, and is the business center, its "day" population exceeding 300,000 in 1901. It has a distinct administration under the lord mayor, with 26 other aldermen and a court of common council. The rest of "Inner" London forms an administrative county, which since 1888 has been under the control of the London County Council of 118 members. For parliamentary purposes London is divided into 58 constituencies with 1 member each, except the City, which returns 2 members (West Ham is sometimes included in parliamentary London, making 60 divisions): Battersea, Bermondsey, Bethnal Green (2), Bow and Bromley, Brixton, Camberwell North, Chelsea, City of London, Clapham, Deptford, Dulwich, Finsbury (2), Fulham, Greenwich, Hackney (3), Haggerston, Hammersmith, Hampstead, Holborn, Hoxton, Islington (4), Kensington (2), Lambeth (2), Lewisham, Limehouse, Marylebone (2), Mile End, Newington West, Norwood, Paddington (2), Peckham, Poplar, Rotherhithe, St. George (Hanover Square), St. George's-in-the-East, St. Pancras (4), Southwark West, Stepney, Strand, Walworth, Wandsworth, West Ham (2), Westminster, Whitechapel, Woolwich. The University of London is also represented. London was probably an ancient British town. It appears to have been resettled by the Romans about 43 A. D., and Londinium (called also Augusta) was the capital of Britannia in the last part of the Roman period. After the departure of the Romans (about 410) and in the early Saxon period its history is obscure, though there were bishops of London from the 7th century. It was plundered by the Danes, and rebuilt by Alfred and Athelstan. It received a charter from William I., and many privileges from Henry I. By the 14th century its commerce had greatly developed. The insurrection of Wat Tyler occurred in 1381. London sided with the Yorkists in the Wars of the Roses, and with the Parliamentarians in the civil war. It was scourged by the plague in 1635, and was almost entirely destroyed by the great fire of 1666. A financial panic happened in 1720, and the "No-Popery" riots in 1780. The "Great Exhibition" of 1851 was the first of the international expositions: it was followed by another in 1862. (For various objects of interest (the British Museum, the Guildhall, the Monument, the National Gallery, the Houses of Parliament, Royal Academy, St. Paul's Cathedral, the Tower, Westminster Abbey, etc.), and for very many local details, see the special headings.) The London Government Act of 1899 divided the administrative county of London (with the exception of the City) into 28 municipal boroughs: Battersea, Bermondsey, Bethnal Green, Camberwell, Chelsea, Deptford, Finsbury, Fulham, Greenwich, Hackney, Hammersmith, Hampstead, Holborn, Islington, Kensington, Lambeth, Lewisham, Marylebone, Paddington, Poplar, St. Pancras, Shoreditch, Southwark, Stepney, Stoke Newington, Wandsworth, Westminster, Woolwich.

(a) The treaty of July 6, 1827, between England, France, and Russia, whereby those powers agreed to compel Turkey and Greece to accept their mediation with a view to restoring peace in the East. Greece was to be made autonomous under the sovereignty of the sultan, the Mohammedan population was to be removed, and the Greeks were to receive possession of all Turkish property in Greece on the payment of an indemnity. The offer of mediation was rejected by Turkey, which resulted in armed intervention. (b) The treaty of Nov. 15, 1831, between Great Britain, France, Austria, Prussia, and Russia, for the settlement of the Belgian question. It prescribed, among other things, that Belgium and Holland should bear separately the debts which they had contracted before the union, and that they should share the liabilities contracted since. The treaty was eventually carried out. (c) The treaty of 1832 between England, France, Russia, and Bavaria, by which the crown of Greece was given to Frederick Otho, second son of the king of Bavaria. (d) The treaty of March 13, 1871, by which the signatory powers of the treaty of Paris (which see) of 1856 acceded to the demand of Russia to strike out the clauses neutralizing the Black Sea.

London, University of. An educational institution, founded at London in 1836, which confers degrees after examination, but, until 1900, provided no courses of instruction.

London Bridge. The first of the bridges across the Thames at London, situated at the head of navigation, half a mile above the Tower. The earliest structure of which there is historical record was destroyed Nov. 16, 1091, by a storm and high tide. The first stone bridge was built 1176–1209 on a wooden foundation. It consisted of 20 arches. The roadway was 926 feet long, 60 feet above water, and 40 feet wide. Houses were built upon it, and in course of time it became a continuous street with 3 openings on each side to the river. A chapel of St. Thomas Becket stood upon the east side. The superstructures were repeatedly devastated by fire, most notably the great fire of 1666. The eleventh span from the Southwark end formed a drawbridge flanked by a tower built in 1426, on the top of which were stuck the heads of persons executed for treason. All the superstructures were removed in 1757. The present stone bridge, built by the Rennies, was begun March 15, 1824, and opened Aug. 1, 1831. It stands about 180 feet above the site of the old structure, which was pulled down in 1832. It is 920 feet long, 56 feet wide, and 55 feet high, and the central span is 150 feet.

Long Parliament. The Parliament which assembled on Nov. 3, 1640, and carried on the civil war. On its showing a disposition to come to terms with the party of Charles I., it was "purged," Dec. 6, 1648, by the expulsion of a large number of its members. It then abolished the House of Lords, and appointed the High Court of Justice which tried and condemned the king. The Parliament was forcibly dissolved by Cromwell on April 20, 1653, but was twice restored in 1659, and was finally dissolved in March, 1660, after providing for the summoning of a free Parliament. In its later history it was known as the Rump Parliament.

He was United States minister to Turkey 1880–81.

Longsword (lông'sȯrd), Richard. A son of Henry II. Rosamond Clifford has long been said to be his mother.

The evidence of Longsword being Rosamund's son is equally untrustworthy, and the fact is discredited by all sound recent historical writers. The name of his true mother is unknown even in early tradition. The argument, drawn from the grant made to Longsword by his father, shortly before his death, in 1188, of the manor of Appleby in Lincolnshire, rests on a confusion between that manor and the manor of Appleby in Westmoreland, which was held by Rosamund's family, the Cliffords.

Notes and Queries, 8th ser., III. 203.

Long Tom. A 42-pound gun, originally part of the armament of the French line-of-battle ship Hoche, captured by the English 1798, and sold to the Americans. It was used during the French attack on Haiti in 1804, was dismounted till 1812; and was placed on the General Armstrong, which ran the blockade of the British at New Orleans, Sept. 9, 1814. This vessel ran into the bay near Horta, Fayal, for water after an encounter with a British squadron, in which she was rendered helpless. Long Tom was dismantled, and lay at Fayal till it was brought back to New York on the steamship Vega April 18, 1893, through the efforts of Colonel Reid, the son of the commander of the General Armstrong.

He was intended, at the outset, for the church, but became a bookseller, a calling which he followed until his death. He wrote the volume of poems "Minnezangen" ("Love Songs," 1783), the epic "De Ruyter" (1784), and a number of dramas. His principal work is, however, his romances. These are the historical novels "Frank van Borselen en Jacoba van Beijeren" (1790–91), "Charlotte van Bourbon" (1792), "Hugo de Groot en Maria van Reigersbergen" (1794), "Louise de Colligny" (1803), "Johan de Witt" (1805). They were followed by a series of contemporary character sketches in three parts, under the title "Zedelijke Vertalen" ("Moral Tales," 1804–05). The novel "Historie van Mejnfvrouw Susanna Bronkhorst" ("The History of Miss Susanna Bronkhorst," 1806–07) was in epistolary form. His principal historical novel, "Maurits Lijnslager," was the next to appear (1808). This was followed, finally, by four others: "Hillegonda Buisman" (1808), "Lotgevallen van den Heere R. J. van Golstein" ("The Adventures of Mr. R. J. van Golstein," 1809–10), "Robert Hellemans" (1815), and "Johan Wouter Blommestein" (1816).

Lopamudra (lō-pä-mō'drä). In Hindu mythology, a girl whom the sage Agastya formed from the most graceful parts of different animals and introduced into the palace of the King of Vidarbha, who believed her to be his daughter. When she was grown, Agastya, who had formed her that he might have a wife after his own heart, asked her in marriage. Her name is explained as meaning that the animals suffered loss (lopa) by her engrossing of their distinctive beauties (mudra), such as the eyes of the deer.

Lopez (lō'pāth), Cape. A cape on the western coast of Africa, situated in lat. 0° 36′ S., long. 8° 44′ E.

Lopez (lō'pāth, locally lō'pāz), Carlos Antonio. Born near Asuncion about 1795: died there, Sept. 10, 1862. President of Paraguay. He was made first consul March 12, 1841, and from that time was practically dictator. Elected president for 10 years in 1844, he was reëlected for 3 years in 1854, and for 7 years in 1857: but these elections were merely nominal, since Congress simply obeyed his orders. His arbitrary acts caused constant quarrels with foreign nations, and in 1859 the United States sent a squadron to the Plata to enforce demands against him; in this case he offered to submit the question of damages to arbitration, but subsequently evaded the claim.

Lopez, Francisco Solano. Born at Asuncion, July 24, 1826 or 1827: died near the Aquidaban, March 1, 1870. A Paraguayan soldier and statesman, son of Carlos Antonio Lopez. On the death of the elder Lopez, Sept. 10, 1862, he assumed the executive by virtue of his father's will, and convoked a congress which elected him president for 10 years. Having previously made secret preparations for war, he interfered in the quarrel of Brazil and Uruguay, and finally, without previous declaration of hostilities, seized a Brazilian mail steamer which was ascending the river (Nov., 1864). Soon after this he sent a large force to invade Matto Grosso, a Brazilian province, and made war on the Argentine. This led to the alliance of Brazil, Uruguay, and Argentina against Paraguay, and a long and bloody struggle. (See Triple Alliance, War of the.) As the events of the war turned against him, his despotism and cruelty bordered on insanity. In many of his worst acts he appears to have been influenced by his Irish mistress, known as Madam Lynch. In 1868 several hundred natives and foreigners were arrested, tortured, and executed on an entirely unproved charge of conspiracy: they included generals, ministers, judges, bishops, priests, merchants, foreign consuls, and his own brothers and brothers-in-law. The American minister, Mr. Washburn, was only saved by the timely arrival of a United States gunboat, and two members of the legation were tortured. Driven at length from Asuncion, he retreated to the interior with a small force, was surprised near the river Aquidaban by a Brazilian force, and was killed with his eldest son.

Lopez, Hermógenes. A Venezuelan politician, president of the republic Feb. 20, 1886, to Feb. 20, 1888.

Lopez, José Hilario. Born at Popayan, Feb. 18, 1798: died at Neiva, Nov. 27, 1869. A New Granadan (Colombian) general and politician. From March 7, 1849, to March 7, 1852, he was president of New Granada. Under him slavery was abolished (Jan., 1852), and various changes were made in the direction of a federal form of government. In 1854, and again from 1859 to 1862, he fought on the side of the federalists, part of the time as commander-in-chief; and on the triumph of his party was made a member of the provisional government 1862–63. Later he was president of Tolima, and in 1867 was named commander-in-chief of the army, but soon retired.

Lopez, Narciso. Born in Venezuela, 1798 or 1799: died at Havana, Cuba, Sept. 1, 1851. A Spanish-American general and filibuster. He fought against the patriots in Venezuela, and subsequently against the Carlists in Spain, where he was governor of Valencia 1839, and became general in 1840. In 1841 he went to Cuba, became involved in revolutionary plots, and in 1849 fled to the United States. Thence he organized three filibustering expeditions. The first (1849) was stopped by the United States authorities; the others (May, 1850, and Aug., 1851) left New Orleans and reached Cuba, but resulted disastrously, and Lopez was finally captured and shot with many of his followers.

Lopez, Vicente Fidel. Born at Buenos Ayres, 1814. An Argentine author, son of Vicente Lopez y Planes. In 1874 he was made rector of the University of Buenos Ayres. Among his works are "Razas del Perú anteriores a la conquista," "Tratado de derecho Romano," and "Historia de la República Argentina." He edited the "Revista del Rio de la Plata."

Lopez Pacheco Cabrera y Bobadilla (pä-chā'-kō kä-brā'rä ē bō-bä-ᴛʜēl'yä), Diego, Duke of Escalona and Marquis of Villena. Died after 1643. A Spanish administrator. He became viceroy of Mexico Aug. 28, 1640. Owing to his being related to the royal house of Portugal, which at this period separated from Spain, he was an object of suspicion, and this was increased by his quarrels with the visitador Palafox. On June 9, 1642, he was arrested, and soon after sent to Spain. There he cleared himself of all charges, and was appointed viceroy of Sicily.

Louis (lö'is or lö'ē) I., surnamed "Le Pieux" and "Le Débonnaire." [E. Lewis, F. Louis, It. Luigi or Lodovico, Sp. Luis, Pg. Luiz, L. Ludovicus, G. Ludwig.] Born 778: died on an island in the Rhine, near Mainz, June 20, 840. Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire 814–840, son of Charles the Great whom he succeeded. He established in 817 an order of succession in accordance with which his eldest son Lothair was to inherit the imperial title with Austrasia and the greater part of Germany, while the rest of the empire was to be divided among his younger sons Pepin and Louis. He married a second wife in 819, and in 829 modified the order of succession adopted in 817 in such a manner as to give Charles, a child of his second marriage, Alamannia, with the title of king. The three elder sons revolted in consequence, and he was compelled to surrender by the defection of his troops on the Field of Lies, near Colmar, in Alsace, in 833. He was liberated by Louis and restored to the throne in 834.

Louis, surnamed "The German." Born about 804: died at Frankfort, Aug. 28, 876. King of Germany 843–876, son of the emperor Louis I. (whom see). On the death of his father he united with his brother Charles against Lothair, whom they defeated at the battle of Fontenay in 841. By the treaty of Verdun in 843, which finally settled the dispute as to the division between the brothers, he received the whole of Germany east of the Rhine, and Mainz, Spires, and Worms on the west. He is commonly regarded as the founder of the German kingdom.

Louis II. Born about 822: died 875. Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire 855–875, son of the emperor Lothair I. whom he succeeded in Italy. He was crowned king of Lorraine by the Pope in 872, in opposition to his uncles Charles the Bald and Louis the German, the throne of Lorraine having been vacated by the death of his brother Lothair in 869.

Louis III. Died 929 (917†). Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire 901–905, son of Boso, king of Provence. He acceded to the throne of Provence in 890; was crowned emperor in 901; and was deposed in 905 by Berengarius I. of Italy, by whom he was blinded and sent back to Provence.

Louis, surnamed "The Child." Born 893: died 911. King of Germany 900–911, son of the emperor Arnulf. He acceded at the age of six, and the government was conducted chiefly by Hatto, archbishop of Mainz. During his reign Germany was devastated by the Magyars or Hungarians. He was the last of the Carolingians in Germany.

Louis IV., surnamed "The Bavarian." Born 1286: died near Munich, Oct. 11, 1347. Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire 1314–47, son of the Duke of Bavaria. He was opposed by Frederick, duke of Austria, whom he made prisoner at the battle of Mühldorf in 1322. He was crowned emperor in 1328. In 1338 the electoral princes met at Rhense, where they adopted resolutions to the effect that the emperor derived his right to the German and imperial crowns by virtue of his election by the electoral princes, independent of any coronation by the Pope.

Louis I. Born at Strasburg, Aug. 25, 1786: died at Nice, Feb. 29, 1868. King of Bavaria 1825–48, son of Maximilian I. Joseph. He was a patron of art and literature. On the outbreak of the revolution in 1848 he abdicated in favor of his son Maximilian II.

Louis II. Born at Nymphenburg, near Munich, Aug. 25, 1845: died June 13, 1886. King of Bavaria 1864–86, son of Maximilian II. He supported Austria against Prussia in 1866, and Prussia against France in 1870–71. He joined the North German Zollverein in 1867, and became a member of the German Empire in 1871. He is chiefly known as the patron of Richard Wagner.

Having become insane, he was confined in the palace of Berg on Lake Starnberg, near Munich, in 1886, and committed suicide by drowning in the lake.

Louis I., King of France. See Louis I., Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire.

Louis II., surnamed "Le Bègue" (F., 'the Stammerer'). Born 846: died at Compiègne, France, April 10, 879. King of France 877–879, son of Charles the Bald.

Louis III. Born about 863: died 882. King of France (conjointly with his brother Carloman) 879–882, son of Louis II.

Louis IV., surnamed "D'Outre-Mer" (F., 'from beyond seas'). Born 921: died 954. King of France 936–954, son of Charles the Simple. During his reign the kingdom was practically governed by Hugh the Great and other powerful vassals. He received his surname from the fact that he was on the death of his father, carried to England by his mother, Eadgifu, sister of Athelstan, king of England, to avoid falling into the hands of his rival, Rudolph of Burgundy, who had been elected king of France by the nobles. He returned from England on the death of Rudolph in 936.

Louis V., surnamed "Le Fainéant" (F., 'the Sluggard'). Born 966: died May, 987. King of France 986–987, son of Lothair. He was the last of the Carolingians in France.

Louis VI., surnamed "Le Gros" (F., 'the Fat'). Born about 1078: died 1137. King of France 1108–37, son of Philip I. He made Suger, abbot of St. Denis, his chief minister.

Louis VII., surnamed "Le Jeune" and "Le Pieux" (F., 'the Young' and 'the Pious'). Born about 1120: died 1180. King of France 1137–80, son of Louis VI. He took part (1147–49) in the second Crusade, and in 1152 divorced his wife, Eleanor of Poitou (whom see), who married Henry of Anjou (afterward Henry II. of England) in the same year. He retained during the earlier part of his reign his father's great minister, Suger.

Louis VIII., surnamed "Le Lion." Born 1187: died at Montpensier, Auvergne, France, Nov. 8, 1226. King of France 1223–26, son of Philip Augustus. He married Blanche of Castile, granddaughter of Henry II. of England, in 1200, and in 1216 was offered the English crown by the barons in opposition to John. He landed in England in 1216; but after the death of John the barons gradually went over to the court party, which recognized John's son, Henry III.; and he returned to France in 1217.

Louis IX. (St. Louis). Born at Poissy, France, April 25, 1215: died near Tunis, Aug. 25, 1270. King of France 1226–70, son of Louis VIII. He undertook a crusade in 1248; captured Damietta in 1249; and during an expedition against Cairo was defeated by the Ayoubite sultan Tooránshâh (Almoaden) and captured, with the whole French army, in April, 1250. He was liberated on the evacuation of Damietta and the payment of a ransom, and returned to France in 1254. He surrendered Périgord, the Limousin, and southern Saintonge to Henry III. of England in 1259, in return for which the latter renounced his claim to Normandy, Anjou, Maine, Touraine, Poitou, and northern Saintonge. He undertook a crusade against Tunis in 1270, during which he died. He was canonized by Boniface VIII. in 1297.

Louis X., surnamed "Le Hutin" (F., 'the Quarreler'). Born 1289: died 1316. King of France 1314–16, son of Philip IV. He inherited the kingdom of Navarre through his mother, Joan of Navarre, in 1305.

Louis XI. Born at Bourges, France, July 3, 1423: died at Plessis-les-Tours, near Tours, France, Aug. 30, 1483. King of France 1461–1483, son of Charles VII. He destroyed the power of the great feudatories, and laid the foundation of the absolute monarchy which afterward obtained in France. The arbitrary and perfidious measures which he adopted provoked a conspiracy of the nobles under the lead of Charles the Bold of Burgundy. The conspirators organized a "league of the public weal," and fought a drawn battle at Montlhéry in 1465, but succumbed to the diplomacy of the king, who detached Charles the Bold and the Duke of Berry by bribery. After having destroyed his less formidable opponents, he made war on Charles, who allied himself with Edward IV. of England. On the death of Charles, at the battle of Nancy against the Swiss in 1477, he united the duchy of Burgundy with the crown. In 1481 he obtained possession of Provence, Anjou, and Maine by the extinction of the house of Anjou.

Louis XII., surnamed "The Father of the People." Born at Blois, France, June 27, 1462: died Jan. 1, 1515. King of France 1498–1515, a descendant of the younger son of Charles V., and founder of the branch line of Valois-Orléans. He divorced his wife, Jeanne, daughter of Louis XI., and married (1499) Anne of Brittany, widow of Charles VIII., in order to retain the duchy of Brittany for the crown. In 1499 he expelled Ludovico Moro and took possession of Milan, to which he laid claim as the grandson of Valentina Visconti. He conquered Naples in 1501 in alliance with Ferdinand the Catholic of Aragon, but disagreed with his ally over the division of the spoil, with the result that his army was defeated by the Spanish general Gonzalvo de Cordova on the Garigliano in 1503. In 1508 he joined the emperor Maximilian, Pope Julius II., and Ferdinand the Catholic in the League of Cambray against Venice. The Pope, however, who feared the presence of the French in Italy, negotiated in 1511 the Holy League with Venice and Ferdinand the Catholic for the expulsion of the French: the league was afterward joined by the emperor and Henry VIII. of England. Henry and the emperor defeated Longueville at Guinegate in the "battle of the spurs," Aug. 16, 1513, and the French were in the same year expelled from Italy; but Louis succeeded in breaking up the league by diplomacy, and was preparing to reconquer Milan when he died.

Louis XIII. Born at Fontainebleau, France, Sept. 27, 1601: died at St. Germain-en-Laye, France, May 14, 1643. King of France 1610–1643, son of Henry IV. He succeeded under the regency of his mother Marie de Médicis; was declared of age in 1614; and married Anne of Austria in 1615. In 1614 he summoned the States-General, which were not summoned again before the Revolution of 1789. In 1624 he chose as his prime minister Richelieu, whom he maintained in office until Richelieu's death in 1642. The chief results of his reign, due to the policy of Richelieu, were the destruction of the political power of the Huguenots, which was completed by the siege and capture of Rochelle 1627–28; the centralization of the government in the hands of the king, who was made independent of the nobles and the parliament; and the abatement of the power of the house of Austria, whose preponderance in Europe was irretrievably lost by the intervention of France and Sweden in the Thirty Years' War. See Richelieu.

Louis XIV., surnamed "Le Grand" (F., 'the Great'). Born at St.-Germain-en-Laye, France, Sept. 5 (16?), 1638: died at Versailles, France, Sept. 1, 1715. King of France 1643–1715, son of Louis XIII. and Anne of Austria. He ascended the throne under the guardianship of his mother, who chose Cardinal Mazarin as her chief minister. He was declared of age at fourteen, but retained Mazarin in office until the cardinal's death in 1661, when he assumed personal control of the government. He assumed the direction of affairs at a time when the policy inaugurated by Richelieu and continued by Mazarin had made the Bourbons absolute at home and paramount abroad. The reforms of Colbert, his comptroller-general of the finances (1661–83), swelled his treasury while promoting industry and economy; and those of Louvois, his minister of war (1666–91), transformed his army into the most perfect military organization in Europe. His desire of conquest and dreams of a French universal monarchy embroiled him in numerous wars, in which his arms were sustained by Turenne, Condé, Luxembourg, Catinat, Villars, Vendôme, and Vaubau. His first war (1667–68) was fought with Spain on account of the Spanish Netherlands, which he claimed through his wife Maria Theresa, daughter of Philip IV. of Spain. It was ended by the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, and resulted in the acquisition of a number of fortified towns on the Belgian frontier. His second war (1672–78) was directed against Holland supported by the Empire, Spain, Brandenburg, and Sweden, and resulted in the acquisition of territory from Spain and Austria at the peace of Nimwegen. In 1681 he annexed Strasburg (see Reunion, Chambers of), and in 1685 revoked the Edict of Nantes (which see). His third war (1688–97) was with England, the Netherlands, the Empire, Spain, and Savoy, and concerned the Palatinate, to which he laid claim. It was unsuccessful, and was ended by the peace of Ryswick, by which Alsace and Strasburg were formally ceded to France. His fourth war (1701–14) concerned the succession in Spain, whose throne he claimed for his grandson, Philip of Anjou. In this war he fought, after 1703, almost single-handed against the bulk of Europe. (See Spanish Succession, War of.) The peace of Utrecht (1713) and of Rastatt and Baden (1714) secured Spain for his grandson, but left Louis with an exhausted treasury and a broken army. As a result of these wars, of the vicious fiscal policy which he introduced after the death of Colbert, and of his bigoted and intolerant policy toward the Huguenots, which drove 50,000 families from France, the country was prostrated, and the way prepared for the Revolution. The reign of Louis XIV. has been styled the Augustan Age of France.

Louis XV. Born at Versailles, France, Feb. 15, 1710: died at Versailles, May 10, 1774. King of France 1715–74, great-grandson of Louis XIV. During his minority the government was administered by the Duke of Orléans. He was declared of age in 1723, and in 1725 married Marie Leczinska, daughter of Stanislas, the dethroned king of Poland. On the death of the Duke of Orléans in 1723, the Duke of Bourbon was appointed prime minister. He was in 1726 superseded by Fleury, after whose death in 1743 the government was conducted by appointees of the king's mistresses Pompadour and Du Barry. In 1741 Louis joined the coalition against Maria Theresa of Austria (see Austrian Succession, War of), and was a party to the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle in 1748. In 1754 hostilities broke out between the French and the English in America without any declaration of war (see French and Indian War), and in 1756 he became involved in the Seven Years' War as the ally of Maria Theresa and Russia against Prussia and England. He lost by the treaty of Paris in 1763 Canada and Louisiana, and at his death left the kingdom impoverished, oppressed, and discontented.

Louis XVI. Born at Versailles, France, Aug. 23, 1754: guillotined at Paris, Jan. 21, 1793. King of France 1774–92, grandson of Louis XV. He married in 1770 Marie Antoinette, daughter of Maria Theresa of Austria, who was at first extremely popular, but afterward incurred the dislike of the people, and whose influence was exerted for the maintenance of the system of favoritism which obtained at court. On ascending the throne in 1774, he appointed Turgot minister of finance. The finances were in extreme disorder, dating from the closing years of the reign of Louis XIV., and the temper of the nation had been roused by the waste and incompetence under Louis XV. Turgot began a series of reforms which were opposed by the nobility and the clergy, with the result that he was superseded by Necker in 1777. Louis recognized the independence of the United States in 1778, and sent an army and a fleet to their support, which materially assisted in securing the peace of Paris between the United States and Great Britain in 1783. France concluded a separate treaty with Great Britain in the same year. On the conclusion of peace, the French troops which had been employed in America returned enthusiastic for freedom and a republican form of government. In 1781 Necker resigned, owing to the failure of the court port his financial reforms, and Calonne became of finance in 1783. He gratified the court by secu loans, but the increasing deficit compelled him in 1787. He was followed by De Brienne, who ad

since 1614. The States-General convened at Vers

(lōvr). A castle (in Paris) of the kings ce from or before the 13th century, and of royal palace until Louis XIV. built
les. The existing palace was begun by Francis I.
nd was extended by his successors down to Louis
n added much, including the imposing east front with its celebrated Corinthian colonnade, 570 feet long, with 28 pairs of coupled columns. Napoleon I. made some additions, to which Napoleon III. added very largely; and the present republic has rebuilt a large section of the north wing which was burned by the Commune. The whole forms one of the most extensive and historically interesting buildings in the world. The façade on the west side of the court ranks as the most perfect example of the early French Renaissance; the additions of Catharine de Médicis are also architecturally important. Those of Napoleon III., while less pure in style, are of great richness, with profuse use of sculpture. In the interior the splendid Galerie d'Apollon, rebuilt by Louis XIV., is one of the few apartments which retain their original aspect. A great part of the interior has been occupied since 1793 by the famous museum, and successive governments have employed the best artists at their command for its decoration.

Love and Business. A miscellany by George Farquhar, printed in 1702.

Love and Death, and Love and Life. Companion paintings by George Frederick Watts, of London. In the former Death, a white-draped figure, crushes Love back among garlands of roses, and forces his way through a portal. In the latter Love guides and aids Life, a fair young girl, undraped, up a rough ascent, while flowers spring up in his footsteps.

Love and Honour. A play by Davenant, licensed 1634, printed 1649, and revived with great success after the Restoration.

Love at a Venture. A comedy by Mrs. Centlivre, printed in 1706. It is founded on T. Corneille's "Le galant double." See Double Gallant, The.

Loveby (luv'bi). The wild gallant in Dryden's play of that name.

Love Chase, The. A comedy by J. Sheridan Knowles, produced in 1837.

Love for Love. A comedy by Congreve, printed in 1695.

Those who will take the pains to read this tedious drama [Otway's "Friendship in Fashion"] will perceive that Congreve deigned to remember it in the composition of his exquisite masterpiece, "Love for Love." The hero in each case is named Valentine, and Malagene, Otway's tiresome button-holer and secret-monger, is a clumsy prototype of the inimitable Tattle. Gosse.

Love in a Forest. A play adapted from Shakspere's "As you Like it" by Charles Johnson in 1723.

Love in a Maze. A comedy by Shirley, licensed in 1631. The title was borrowed by Dion Boucicault for a comedy in 1844.

Love in a Riddle. A pastoral by Cibber, printed in 1729. This was written in imitation of the "Beggar's Opera," and played at Drury Lane on Jan. 7, 1729. It was hissed by Cibber's enemies, and converted into "Damon and Phillida." Dict. Nat. Biog.

Lovejoy, Owen. Born at Albion, Maine, Jan. 6, 1811: died at Brooklyn, N. Y., March 25, 1864. An American clergyman and antislavery politician, brother of E. P. Lovejoy. He was a member of Congress from Illinois 1857–64.

Lovel (luv'el). In Ben Jonson's comedy "The New Inn," a soldier and scholar, and a chivalric lover. This part contains some of Jonson's most beautiful poetry.

Lovel. The name under which Charles Lamb describes his father, John Lamb, in "Old Benchers of the Inner Temple."

Lovelace (luv'lās). The principal male character in Richardson's novel "Clarissa Harlowe": an unscrupulous libertine whose name has become a synonym for characters of that nature. He is an expansion of Rowe's Lothario.

Lovelace (luv'lās), Countess of (Augusta Ada Byron). Born Dec. 10, 1815: died Nov. 29, 1852. The daughter of Lord Byron.

Lovelace, Richard. Born in Kent, 1618: died at London, 1658. An English Cavalier poet. He was educated at the Charterhouse and at Gloucester Hall, Oxford. He was imprisoned by the Parliament in 1642; took part in the siege of Dunkirk in 1646; and was imprisoned on his return to England in 1648. He was released after the king's execution, but his estate was spent, and he died in poverty in the purlieus of London. In 1649 he published "Lucasta" (from Lux Casta, his name for Lucy Sacheverell): this was revised while he was in prison. After his death his brother collected and published his poems as "Lucasta: Posthume Poems" (1659). His name survives chiefly on account of his lyrics "To Althea from Prison" and "To Lucasta on going to the Wars."

Loveless (luv'les). A character in Cibber's comedy "Love's Last Shift," and in its continuation, Vanbrugh's "The Relapse": a debauched libertine. He grows weary of his wife, Amanda, in six months; leaves the country and his debts behind him; and returns penniless to England to reform and be forgiven (after a "Relapse" with Berinthia) by Amanda whom he really loves.

Loveless, Elder. The principal male character in Beaumont and Fletcher's play "The Scornful Lady." He is a suitor of the lady, who scorns and flouts him; but in the end he wins her by a trick.

Loveless, Young. The brother of the elder Loveless: a heartless, callous prodigal.

Love Lies a Bleeding. See Philaster.

Lovell, Mansfield. Born at Washington, D. C., Oct. 20, 1822: died at New York, June 1, 1884. An American general in the Confederate service.

Lovel the Widower. A novel by Thackeray, published in 1861.

Lovely (luv'li), Ann. A character in Mrs. Centlivre's comedy "A Bold Stroke for a Lover": an heiress to win whom Colonel Fainwell, her lover, disguises himself as the real Simon Pure whom she was intended by her guardian to marry.

Love makes the Man, or the Fop's Fortune. A comedy by Cibber, made from Fletcher and Massinger's "Custom of the Country" and "Elder Brother." It was acted and printed in 1701.

Lover (luv'ėr), Samuel. Born at Dublin, Feb. 24, 1797: died at St. Heliers, July 6, 1868. An Irish novelist, song-writer, and painter. His chief novels are "Rory O'More" (1837: it was dramatized and had a run of 108 nights) and "Handy Andy" (1842). His "Songs and Ballads" were published in 1839, including "The Angel's Whisper," "The Low-backed Car," "The Four-leaved Shamrock," "Molly Bawn," "Father Molloy," etc.

Lovere (lō-vā're). A town in northern Italy, on the Lake of Iseo 21 miles north-northwest of Brescia.

Lover's Complaint, A. A poem by Shakspere, written probably in 1593–94, but published with the sonnets in 1609. Fleay.

Lover's Leap. A promontory at the southwestern extremity of Leucas (Santa Maura), Ionian Islands: the traditional scene of the death of Sappho.

Lover's Life, Complaint of a. A poem inserted in the 16th-century editions of Chaucer, and attributed to him. Manuscript authority gives it to Lydgate.

Lovers' Melancholy, The. A play by Ford, produced in 1628, printed in 1629. This play contains the celebrated contention between the nightingale and the musician from Strada.

Lovers' Progress, The. A play by Fletcher and Massinger, printed in 1647. "The plot is taken from D'Audignier's 'Histoire tragi-comique de notre temps,' 1615. . . . This play is unquestionably a revised version of the 'Wandering Lovers,' a play licensed 6 Dec., 1623, and may be identified with the 'Tragedy of Cleander' (ascribed to Massinger), which was performed at Blackfriars 7 May, 1634. A play called 'The Wandering Lovers or The Picture' was entered in the 'Stationers' Register' 9 Sept., 1653, as a work of Massinger. In spite of the puzzling after-title the entry probably refers to the 'Lovers' Progress.'" Bullen.

Lovers' Quarrels. A play by King, altered from Vanbrugh's "The Mistake" in 1790.

Lover's Vows. A comedy by Mrs. Inchbald, produced at Covent Garden Oct. 11, 1798. It is from Kotzebue.

Love's Contrivance, or Le Médecin Malgré lui. A comedy by Mrs. Centlivre, acted and printed in 1703. It was taken from "Le médecin malgré lui" and "Le mariage forcé" by Molière.

Love's Cure, or the Martial Maid. A play, probably by Massinger and Middleton according to Bullen. Fleay thinks it was by Beaumont and Fletcher, altered by Massinger. It was produced about 1623, printed 1647.

Love's Labour 's Lost. A comedy by Shakspere, produced in 1589, printed in 1598. Various changes were made in it in 1597, when it was retouched for a court performance. The title is "A pleasant conceited Comedy as it was presented before her Highness this last Christmas. Newly corrected and augmented by W. Shakespeare. Imprinted 1598." This is the first appearance of Shakspere's name on a play title-page. There is no doubt that an earlier version existed. Morley; Fleay.

Love's Labour 's Won. A lost play by Shakspere, printed in 1600, and entered in the "Stationers' Register" Aug. 23, 1600. It is probably the original of "Much Ado about Nothing," as it was called "Benedict and Bettris" when acted before King James in 1612–13, although presented that same Christmas to Prince Charles, the Palatine, and Lady Elizabeth under its proper name. Fleay.

Love's Last Shift, or the Fool in Fashion. A comedy by Cibber, produced in Jan., 1694. Vanbrugh's "Relapse" is a sequel to this. See Foppington, Lord.

Love's Metamorphosis. A comedy by John Lyly, published in 1601.

Loves of the Angels, The. A poem by Thomas Moore, published in 1822.

Loves of the Plants, The. The second part of the "Botanic Garden," a versified treatise on botany, by Erasmus Darwin, published in 1789. The first part, "The Economy of Vegetation," did not appear till 1792.

Loves of the Triangles, The. A satirical poem by Canning and Frere, published in the "Anti-Jacobin." It was in ridicule of Erasmus Darwin and his "Loves of the Plants."

Love Spell, The. See Elisire d'Amore.

Love's Pilgrimage. A romantic comedy by Fletcher and another, probably written by 1612. It was printed in 1647. The plot is from a novel of Cervantes, and a part of Jonson's "New Inn" is incorporated in it. Fleay identifies it with "The History of Cardenio."

Low (lō), Seth. Born at Brooklyn, N. Y., Jan. 18, 1850. An American educator. He was elected mayor of Brooklyn in 1881 and again in 1883, and president of Columbia University, New York, in 1890. In 1901 he resigned the presidency of the university and was mayor of New York 1902–3.

Low, Will H. Born at Albany, N. Y., May 31, 1853. An American figure-painter, noted also for his decorative work and designs for stained glass, and as an illustrator. He was a pupil of Carolus Duran.

Low (lō) Archipelago, or Paumota (pou-mō'-tä), or Paumotu (-tō), or Tuamotu (twä-mō'tō) Islands. An extensive group of small islands, chiefly coral, situated in the South Pacific, east of the Society Islands and south of the Marquesas Islands. They are a French protectorate.

Loyola (lō-yō'lä), Ignatius de (Inigo López de Recalde). Born at the castle of Loyola, Guipuzcoa, Spain, 1491: died at Rome, July 31, 1556. A Spanish soldier and prelate, founder of the Society of Jesus. He was educated as a page at the court of Ferdinand the Catholic, and afterward joined the army. While recovering from a severe wound received at the siege of Pamplona by the French in 1521 he was converted, and dedicated himself to the service of the Virgin. He entered in 1528 the University of Paris, where, with a number of fellow-students, among whom were Laynez, Bobadilla, Rodriguez, and Pierre Lefèvre, he projected in 1534 a religious order, which received the name of the Society or Company of Jesus, for the conversion of the infidels, and to counteract the Protestant reformation. The order was confirmed by Pope Paul III. in 1540, and Loyola became its first general in 1541, although Laynez was from its inception really the controlling spirit of the organization. He remained in office until his death. He wrote in Spanish "Constitution of the Order" and "Spiritual Exercises" (1548). His life has been written by Ribadeneira, Maffei, Bouhours, and Spuller.

Loyola, Martin Garcia Oñez de. Born in Guipuzcoa about 1548: died between Imperial and Angol, Chile, Nov. 22, 1598. A Spanish soldier, nephew of Ignatius Loyola. He went to Chile in 1568, distinguished himself in the campaign against the Inca Tupac Amaru, and finally captured him in 1571. Subsequently he married the Inca's niece. In 1592 he was appointed captain-general of Chile. There he prosecuted the Araucanian war with vigor, but was eventually surprised by the Indians at a camp and killed with most of his companions. In the general Indian uprising which followed the Spaniards were driven beyond the Biobio.

Lucayans (lö-kī'anz). [Sp. Lucayos, from some Indian word.] The aboriginal inhabitants of the Bahama Islands. They were the first Americans encountered by Columbus, who described them as a mild and indolent race, living partly by agriculture, and going naked. It appears that their language was related to that of Cuba and Haiti, and probably they were of Arawak stock. Their foreheads were artificially flattened, as is shown by recently discovered skulls. Early in the 16th century many thousands of them were induced, by false promises, to go to Española, where they were enslaved; others were carried off by force, and in a few years all had perished.

Lucayos (lö-kī'ōs). The name originally given by the Spaniards to the Bahama Islands, from the Indians who inhabited them. It is still used occasionally, principally by Spanish authors.

Lucca (lök'kä). A province of Tuscany, Italy. It was made a principality by Napoleon for his sister Elisa Bacciocchi; was granted as a duchy to Maria Louisa of Spain in 1815; and was annexed by Tuscany in 1847. Area, 558 square miles. Population (1891), 288,637.

Lucca, F. Lucques (lük). The capital of the province of Lucca, Italy, situated in lat. 43° 51' N., long. 10° 31' E.: the Roman Luca. It is noted especially for silk manufactures, and also for oil and woolen manufactures. The cathedral (duomo) is a notable medieval church with arcaded exterior. The exterior is remarkable for its rich inlaid work in colored stone, representing hunting scenes. The interior has round arches below with massive piers, a high triforium with rich tracery, and a low clearstory with circular windows. The so-called "Tempietto," in one aisle, is a little octagonal domed Renaissance temple, built in 1482 to receive the Oriental crucifix called the Volto Santo. San Giovanni is an early basilica with later medieval alterations. The chief portal has a fine Romanesque relief of the Virgin, with the apostles and angels. The fluted columns of the nave are Roman. The old Lombard baptistery is 59 feet square; it has a remarkable 14th-century dome on pendentives. The Deposito di Mendicità (poorhouse), formerly the Palazzo Borghi, is a fine example of an Italian medieval palace (1413) designed for defense. It is of red brick, with traceried windows, and has a high tower. There are considerable remains existing of a Roman amphitheater, of date about 100 A. D., though the arena is occupied by the Piazza del Mercato. It had two tiers of 54 arches, and could seat about 10,000. One of the entrance gates, in rusticated masonry, survives. Lucca was an ancient Italian town, and became a Roman colony about 177 B. C.; was the seat of a medieval duchy, and later of a republic; belonged to Pisa in the 14th century; and became independent in 1369. It was conquered by the French in 1797. Population (1891), about 76,000.

Lucentio (lö-sen'shiō). In Shakspere's "Taming of the Shrew," an accomplished young student from Pisa, whose skilful wooing of Bianca forms the underplot of the play.

Lucera (lö-chā'rä). A town in the province of Foggia, Italy, 10 miles west-northwest of Foggia: the ancient Luceria. It has a cathedral and a castle. The latter, built on the site of the classical citadel by the emperor Frederick II., is of great extent and imposing aspect. Population, about 14,000.

Lucerne (lū-sėrn'; F. pron. lü-särn'), G. Luzern (lö-tsern'). 1. A canton of Switzerland, bounded by Aargau on the north, Zug and Schwyz on the east, Unterwalden on the southeast, and Bern on the south and west. Its surface is hilly and mountainous. It is one of the four Forest Cantons, and sends 7 members to the National Council. The prevailing language is German, and the religion Roman Catholic. Lucerne joined the League of the Forest Cantons in 1332. It took part in the battle of Sempach in 1386, and annexed the Entlebuch at the beginning of the 15th century. It was part of the Helvetic Republic. In 1847 it was the leading member of the Sonderbund (which see). Area, 579 square miles. Population (1888), 135,360.

2. The capital of the canton of Lucerne, situated at the outflow of the Reuss from the Lake of Lucerne, in lat. 47° 3' N., long. 8° 18' E. It is a central point for tourists. The Reuss is crossed here by two interesting old bridges. The Kapellbrucke is a roofed bridge, having 154 subjects painted on the interior of the roof, most of them from the legends of Sts. Mauritius and Leodegar, the patrons of Lucerne. The picturesque medieval Wasserthurm stands in the middle of the river, beside the bridge. The Muhlen- or Sprener-Brucke is another roofed bridge: the inner side of its roof is painted with an elaborate Dance of Death. Other objects of interest are the Lion of Lucerne (see below), Hofkirche, Gletscher-Garten, and Rathaus (with antiquarian museum). Near the city are the Rigi, Pilatus, etc. It was founded on the site of a monastery. It was occupied by the federal troops in the Sonderbund war (1847). Population (1888), 20,571.

Lucerne, Lake of, or Lake of the Four Forest Cantons, G. Vierwaldstättersee (fēr-vält'-stet-ter-zā). Locally it is divided into the Luzernersee, Alpnachersee, Küssnachtersee, Urnersee or Bay of Uri, Gersauersee, and Weggisersee. It is traversed by the Reuss, which has its outlet at Lucerne. Violent winds prevail on it. It is bordered by lofty mountains (Rigi, etc.), and is famous for its magnificent scenery and for the legendary history of William Tell. Length, 23 miles. Height above sea-level, 1,435 feet.

Lucerne, Lion of. A famous piece of sculpture, by Thorwaldsen, commemorating the heroism and devotion of nearly 800 Swiss guards who died to save Louis XVI. in the attack on the Tuileries, Aug. 10, 1792. The colossal figure of the crouching lion, transfixed and dying but still faithfully defending the lilied shield of France, is carved in the round in a recess in the face of an upright, vine-draped rock, in a little park, at Lucerne. A commemorative inscription, with the names of the officers killed, is cut in the rock.

Lucetta (lö-set'tä). A waiting-woman in Shakspere's "Two Gentlemen of Verona."

Luchaze (lö-chä'ze), or Baluchaze (bä-lö-chä'-ze). A Bantu tribe of Angola, West Africa. They live between the head streams of the Kuito River, southeast of Bihe, in a beautiful wooded country. They are related to the Ambuela and Ngangela tribes, file their fore teeth, wear skins and baobab cloth, and are clever iron- and copper-smiths. They obtain their pottery by barter. Their granaries are large, and their villages clean and well built.

Luchon. See Bagnères-de-Luchon.

Lucia (lū'shiä), Saint. [L., fem. of Lucius; E. Lucy.] A martyr of the primitive church in Syracuse, who perished during the persecution of Diocletian. According to the legend, she rejected a pagan suitor whom her mother desired her to marry, was denounced as a Christian, and was condemned to be outraged, but escaped this fate and died in prison. She is the patroness especially of those who suffer from distemper of the eyes.

Lucia. In Southerne's "Sir Antony Love, or The Rambling Lady," a young girl who disguises herself as a man (Sir Antony) and follows her lover to win him. She is the "rambling lady."

Lucia di Lammermoor (lö-chē'ä dē läm-mer-mōr'). An opera by Donizetti, produced at Naples in 1835, at Paris in 1839, at London in 1838 in Italian and in English in 1843. The plot is from Scott's "Bride of Lammermoor."

Lucian (lū'shian). [Gr. Λουκιανός, L. Lucianus.] Born at Samosata, Syria, about 120 A. D.: died about 200. A celebrated Greek satirist and humorist. He was a free-thinker, attacking with pungent satire the religious beliefs of his time: for this, according to Suidas, he was called "the Blasphemer," and was torn to pieces by dogs — doubtless a pious invention. He wrote rhetorical, critical, and biographical works, romances, dialogues, poems, etc.

Lucian (160 A. D.), a native of Samosata on the Euphrates, lived to write Attic prose which, though by no means faultless, was the best that had been written for 400 years. His "Dialogues of the Gods," almost Homeric in their freshness and almost Aristophanic in their fun, bring out the ludicrous side of the popular Greek faith; the "Dialogues of the Dead" are brilliant satires on the living. In his "Auction of Philosophers" the gods knock down each of the great thinkers to the highest bidder; Socrates goes for about £500; Aristotle for a fifth of that sum. . . . Much historical interest belongs to his sketch of "Peregrinus," a man whom he represents as having been a Christian. . . . His "Timon," the misanthrope, is interesting in connection with Shakspere's play. The "Veracious History," a mock narrative of travel, is the original of such books as "Gulliver's Travels." Lucian has much in common with Swift, and more, perhaps, with Voltaire.

Jebb, Greek Lit., p. 153.

Lucian. Born at Samosata, Syria, about 240 A. D.: martyred at Nicomedia, Bithynia, about 312. A theologian and biblical critic, presbyter of Antioch, who was put to death as a Christian under Maximin. Little is known of his career. He was the reputed author of a creed which was submitted to the Synod of Antioch (341) as a substitute for the Nicene Creed, and which is said to have been adopted by a Semi-Arian synod in Caria in 367.

Luciana (lö-si-ä'nä). In Shakspere's "Comedy of Errors," the sister of Adriana.

Lucianists (lū-shian-ists). The followers of Lucian or Lucan, a Marcionite leader in the 2d century, who taught that the actual soul and body of a man would not come forth in the resurrection, but some representative of them.

Lucifer (lū'si-fėr). [L., 'light-bringing.'] The morning star; the planet Venus when it appears in the morning before sunrise: when it follows the sun, or appears in the evening, it is called Hesperus, or the evening star. The name "day-star" is applied by Isaiah figuratively to a king of Babylon; this was rendered in the authorized version by "Lucifer." From this passage (Isa. xiv. 12) the name was, by mistake, also given to Satan.

> Pandæmonium, city and proud seat
> Of Lucifer; so by allusion call'd
> Of that bright star to Satan paragon'd.
> Milton, P. L., x. 425.

Lucifer. Died 371 A. D. A bishop of Caliris (Cagliari) in Sardinia, a fierce controversialist, and founder of a sect of Luciferians named from him, whose chief tenet was that no bishop who had conformed in any measure to Arianism could retain his rank if he rejoined the orthodox party.

Lucile (lū-sėl'). A narrative poem by the Earl of Lytton (Owen Meredith), published in 1860.

Lucilius (lū-sil'i-us), Caius. Born at Suessa Aurunca, Campania, about 180 B. C.: died at Naples, 103 B. C. A Latin satirical poet, author of "Saturæ," miscellaneous poems containing a very free criticism of contemporary life.

Lucina (lū-sī'nä). In Roman mythology, the goddess who presided over childbirth, considered as a daughter of Jupiter and Juno, but frequently confused with Juno or with Diana. She corresponded more or less closely to the Greek goddess Ilithyia.

Lucinde (lū-sañd'). 1. The daughter of Sganarelle in Molière's "L'Amour médecin."— 2. The daughter of Géronte in Molière's "Le médecin malgré lui." It is to cure her that Sganarelle is obliged to pretend to be a doctor.

Lucio (lū'shiō). A fantastic and profligate character in Shakspere's "Measure for Measure."

Lucius (lū'shius). [L., 'pertaining to the light or daybreak'; Gr. Λούκιος, It. Lucio, Sp. Lucio, Pg. Lucio, F. Luce.] Bishop of Adrianople in the 4th century. He was expelled from his see by the Arians about 340; appealed to the Roman Council under Julius, which ordered his restoration—a decree which was resisted by the Eusebians in his diocese; and was finally reëstablished in his see by Constantius, in accordance with the decision of the Council of Sardica.

Lucius I. Bishop of Rome 253–254.

Lucius II. (Gerhard da Caccianamichi). Died Feb. 25, 1145. Pope 1144–45. He was killed by a stone thrown during the insurrection against the papal government.

Population (1891), 774,163.—3. The capital of Oudh and of the district of Lucknow, situated on the Gumti about lat. 26° 52′ N., long. 80° 55′ E. It manufactures gold and silver brocade, muslin, etc. Among the chief buildings is the mausoleum Imambara, a great hall dating from the middle of the last century, and one of the most interesting productions of the later Indian-Saracenic style. The plan is rectangular, 263 by 145 feet. The fine central hall, 162 by 53½ feet, is arcaded on both sides and flanked in front by a porch and at the back by a gallery. Each end presents an octagonal room and two closed side chambers. The vaults are formed in thick, solid masses of concrete, precisely according to the ancient Roman system. The general effect is picturesque and impressive, though the ornamental details show decadence. Lucknow was defended (at first under Sir Henry Lawrence) against the Indian mutineers July–Sept., 1857; relieved by Havelock Sept. 25; again relieved by Campbell Nov. 17; and finally captured by Campbell March, 1858. Population (1891), with cantonment, 273,028.

Luck of Eden Hall, The. A drinking-cup long preserved at Eden Hall in Cumberland. According to "Notes and Queries," Feb. 18, 1893, it is still in existence. It is a chalice of enameled glass, and is of 10th-century workmanship, presumably Venetian. There is a legend that the luck of the Musgrave family depends on its preservation:

> "If this cup either break or fall,
> Farewell the luck of Eden Hall."

Lumpkin (lump'kin), Tony. In Goldsmith's comedy "She Stoops to Conquer," an ignorant, noisy, conceited country squire, both loutish and vicious. Liston was noted for his performance of this part.

> The widow Blackacre and her son are like her lawsuit — everlasting. A more lively, palpable, bustling, ridiculous picture cannot be drawn. Jerry is a hopeful lad, though undutiful, and gets out of bad hands into worse. Goldsmith evidently had an eye to these two precious characters in "She Stoops to Conquer." Tony Lumpkin and his mother are of the same family, and the incident of the theft of the casket of jewels and the bag of parchments is nearly the same in both authors.

In 1834 he fixed his residence at Lagôa Santa, and the remainder of his life was passed in the exploration of the numerous limestone caves of Minas Geraes, and the study of the fossil (Quaternary) animals found in them. Of these he discovered several hundred species.

Lunda (lön'dä). A great Bantu nation and kingdom, recently divided between Portuguese Angola and the Kongo State. Muata-Yamvua, the ruler of Lunda, was at one time the head of an empire extending from the Kuango River to the Lualaba, including, at the extreme northwest and southeast, the vassal states of Muene Putu Kassongo and Muata Cazembe, and in the southwest the Kioko nation. The Lunda tribe occupies the basins of the upper Kassai and Lulua. They have a fine physique, like the Baluba, and are friendly to the whites, but are lazy and given to slave-trading. Weakened by feuds, they are victimized by the Makioko, their nominal vassals, and are powerless to resist the encroachments of the whites. The Lunda language differs little in structure from Kimbundu, the language of Angola.

Lupercal (lū'pėr-kal). [See Lupercus.] A grotto near the western angle of the Palatine Hill, in ancient Rome, dedicated, according to tradition, by the original Arcadian settlers to Lupercus, a Latin rustic deity. It was the den of the she-wolf that suckled Romulus and Remus. At time went on the Lupercal was adorned architecturally, and its decoration was renewed by Augustus. Near the Lupercal was the Ficus Ruminalis, the fig-tree beneath which Romulus and Remus were left by the retiring waters of the Tiber, and above it was the primitive thatched hut preserved to imperial days as a relic of Romulus.

Lupercalia (lū-pėr-kā'li-ä). [See Lupercal.] One of the most ancient of Roman festivals, celebrated every year in the middle of February. The origin of the festival is older than the legend of Romulus and the wolf, with which, as with the Greek cult of Pan, it was sought later to connect it. It was originally a local purification ceremony of the Palatine city, in which human victims were sacrificed in the Lupercal cave near the Porta Romana, after having been conducted around the walls. In historic times the victims were goats and a dog, and the celebrants ran around the old line of the Palatine walls, striking all whom they met with thongs cut from the skins of the slaughtered animals. These blows were reputed to preserve women from sterility. The divinity of the Lupercalia was the old Etrurian god Inuus, akin to Mars.

Lupercus (lū-pėr'kus). [L., 'he who wards off the wolves.'] The god Inuus as the protecting deity of shepherds.

Lusatia (lū-sā'shiä), G. Lausitz (lou'sits). A region in Germany, now included in the kingdoms of Saxony and Prussia. Its early inhabitants were Slavs, and, though partly Germanized, it still has a large population of Slavs (Wends). It was a mark or march on the border of the empire. Upper Lusatia (Ober-Lausitz), in the southern part, was acquired by Brandenburg from Bohemia about 1253. Lower Lusatia (Nieder-Lausitz), in the northern part, was acquired by Brandenburg early in the 14th century. Upper Lusatia was gained by Bohemia in 1346, and Lower Lusatia in 1373. Lusatia belonged temporarily to Hungary in the second half of the 15th century. With Bohemia it passed to the house of Hapsburg in 1526. It was ceded by Austria to Saxony in 1635. Lower Lusatia and part of Upper Lusatia were ceded by Saxony to Prussia in 1815.

Lusiad (lū'si-ad), The. The national epic of Portugal, by Camoens, published in 1572. It has been translated into English by Fanshawe, Mickle, Musgrave, Mitchell, and others. It is in 10 cantos, containing 1,102 stanzas. See the extract.

> The poem on which the general reputation of Camoens depends, usually known under the name of the Lusiad, is entitled by the Portuguese "Os Lusiadas," or the Lusitanians. It appears to have been the object of the author to produce a work altogether national. It was the exploits of his fellow-countrymen that he undertook to celebrate. But, though the great object of the poem is the recital of the Portuguese conquests in the Indies, the author has very happily succeeded in embracing all the illustrious actions performed by his compatriots in other quarters of the world, together with whatever of splendid and heroic achievement historical narration or popular fables could supply. It is by mistake that Vasco da Gama has been represented as the hero of Camoens, and that those portions of the work not immediately connected with that commander's expedition are regarded as episodes to the main action. There is, in truth, no other leading subject than his country, nor are there any episodes except such parts as are not immediately connected with her glory.

His father, who was a slate-cutter by trade, removed with his family to Mansfeld the year after the birth of the son. His early education was obtained at Magdeburg, and at Eisenach (1498), where he lived with Frau Ursula Cotta. In 1501 he matriculated at the University of Erfurt for the study of jurisprudence. He took his examination in 1505, and subsequently delivered lectures on the physics and ethics of Aristotle. This same year, against the wishes of his family, he determined to become a monk, and entered the Augustine monastery at Erfurt. In 1507 he was consecrated a priest, and in 1508 was called as professor of philosophy to the University of Wittenberg. In 1510 he went to Rome on business connected with his monastic order. In 1512, after his return to Wittenberg, he was made doctor of theology. His first important action in the direction of ecclesiastical reform was his publication, Oct. 31, 1517, on the church door at Wittenberg, of ninety-five theses against the sale of indulgences by the Dominican Tetzel. His propositions were immediately condemned as heretical, and viol tacks were made upon him from various quarter before and after a summons to Rome, which he d obey. In 1520 he published his famous "Address Christian Nobles of the German Nation," which w lowed by the tract "On the Babylonian Captivity Church of God." This same year, together with his ents, he was formally excommunicated by Leo his writings were burned at Rome, Cologne, and Lo He retaliated by publicly burning, at Wittenberg, t of excommunication and the decretals of the P whom he now renounced all allegiance. At the Worms, April, 1521, whither he was summoned emperor Charles V., he made the celebrated speech ended with: "There I take my stand. I can do else. So help me, God. Amen." In spite of his v defense of his doctrines, he was proscribed by t peror. On his return from Worms, through the Thu Forest, he was, by order of his friend, the Elector ony, ostensibly taken prisoner and conveyed to the burg, at Eisenach, where he remained in disguise lowing ten months under the name of Junker During this time he translated the New Testame German, and had already completed it when he l Wartburg in March, 1522. At this time, in spite of proscription by the emperor, he returned to Witte and delivered there a series of sermons against the cism of the puritanical image-breakers. Here, t published this same year the translation of the New ment. He had already begun the translation of t Testament, of which the books of Moses were p print in 1523 and the Psalms in 1524; and in this year appeared also his first hymn-book. In 1524, f he laid aside his cowl, and in 1525 married Kathari Bora, a nun, who had renounced her vows and l convent. From 1526–29 he was engaged in the p tion of a new church service. In this latter year, engaged in the conference at Marburg with Zwin other Swiss divines. The Lutheran translation whole Bible, completed in 1532, was finally publis 1534. It was bounded by Galatia on the north, Cappadocia on the east, Cilicia on the south, and Pisidia and Phrygia on the west. Sometimes it included Isauria, and sometimes it was included in Cappadocia. Surface elevated.

Lyceius, Lyceus (lī-sē'us). [Gr. Λύκειος, perhaps (from λύκος, wolf) 'wolf-slayer.'] In Greek mythology, an epithet of Apollo.

Lyceum (lī-sē'um). [Gr. Λύκειον.] A gymnasium and exercise-ground of ancient Athens, lying on the right bank of the Ilissus, at the place now called Ilissia, a short distance east of the palace garden. It was dedicated to Apollo Lyceius, and was already the chief gymnasium of Athens in the time of Pisistratus. It was noted for its fine groves of plane-trees. Aristotle and his disciples formed the habit of discussing their philosophy while following the shady walks of this gymnasium, and hence received the name of Peripatetics.

Lycia (lis'i-a). [Gr. Λυκία.] In ancient geography, a division of Asia Minor, bordering on the Mediterranean and on Caria, Phrygia, Pisidia, and Pamphylia. The surface is mountainous. The Lycians aided the Khita against Rameses II. Its 23 cities formed the Lycian League. It was conquered by Persia in the 6th century B. C., and afterward passed to Macedon, Egypt, Syria, and finally to Rome.

Lycians (lis'i-anz). The inhabitants of Lycia; especially, a race inhabiting ancient Lycia, Aryan or Indo-European in language, as is shown by important inscriptions in a peculiar character recently recovered and elucidated. The Lycians seem to have exerted considerable influence in early days on the Greeks, especially through their worship of Apollo. Interesting monuments of their architecture and sculpture have been brought together in the British Museum. Some sculptures found in Lycia vie in refinement with the riper archaic art of Attica.

Lycidas (lis'i-das). A shepherd in Vergil's third Bucolic.

Lycidas. An elegiac poem by Milton (published 1637), commemorating the death of his friend Edward King.

Lycurgus. Born at Athens about 396 B. C.: died about 323 B. C. An Attic orator, son of Lycophron of the aristocratic family of the Eteobutadæ. He was thrice appointed manager of the Athenian finances for terms of 5 years each. Only one entire oration of Lycurgus is extant.

Lydda (lid'a). A place in the territory of Benjamin: in the Old Testament Lod. In Acts it is mentioned in connection with a miracle performed by Peter. During the Judeo-Roman war it was destroyed by Cestius Gallus. After the uprising of Bar-Cochba it became the seat of a Talmudical school. It was also an episcopal see, and in 445 a council was held there at which Pelagius defended himself. Tradition makes it the birthplace of St. George, where he also was buried. In 1191 it was destroyed by Saladin, and in 1271 sacked by the Mongols. At present it is a village (Ludd) with a church of St. George, situated between Ramleh and Jaffa.

Lydgate (lid'gāt), Doctor. A physician in George Eliot's "Middlemarch." He is ambitious but a selfish wife takes the savor out of his ambition, and he dies a comparatively young and obscure man.

Lydgate, who has received a true vocation, whose intellectual passion predestines him to far-resonant action in the world of scientific research,—Lydgate, against whom the temptations of the flesh and the devil would have been idle, is subdued by that third enemy of man, the world, incarnated in the form of a creature [Rosamond] with feminine voice, swan-like neck, perfectly turned shoulders, exquisite curves of lip and eyelid, and, hidden behind these, the hardness of a little sordid soul.

Lydgate, John. Born at Lydgate, near Newmarket, about 1370: died about 1451. An English poet. He is said to have studied at both Oxford and Cambridge, and later in France and Italy (but this is doubtful). He entered the church in 1389. He gained a position as poet at the court of Henry IV., which he held during the reign of Henry V. and after the accession of Henry VI. After 1390 he made the acquaintance of Chaucer, and often calls himself "Chaucer's disciple." His numerous works include "Falls of Princes," a narrative poem written between 1430 and 1438; "Troy Book," in heroic couplets, containing a panegyric on Chaucer (1412–20: first printed by Pynson in 1513); "The Story of Thebes," intended as an additional Canterbury tale (about 1420); "The Life of Our Lady," a religious narrative poem, printed by Caxton in 1484; "The Dance of Death," from the French, printed first in 1554 (also, with Holbein's drawings, in 1794); "The Court of Sapience," a philosophical work, printed by Caxton (1481?); "The Temple of Glass," printed by Caxton (1479?); and a number of lives of saints, allegories, fables, historical and political poems, satires, etc. "The Complaint of the Black Knight," which was attributed to Chaucer, is by Lydgate, and also a number of the minor poems which have been attributed to Chaucer.

Lydia (lid'i-a). [Gr. Λυδία.] A country occupying the western coast of Asia Minor, bordering on the Ægean Sea and on Mysia, Phrygia, and Caria. The old name of it seems to have been Mæonia, and its inhabitants a division of the adjacent Phrygians. Later it was invaded by Semites, who gave it the name of Lydia (compare the Old Testament Lud, descendants of Shem, Gen. x. 22). The name Mæonia was afterward confined to the eastern part of the country, and Lydia to the western. About 700 B. C. a revolution overthrew the Semitic reign, and brought the native dynasty of the Mermnadæ to the throne, with Gyges as first king. Under them Lydia rose to the position of a mighty kingdom extending from the coast to the river Halys, with Sardes as capital. The prosperous Greek cities were brought either to subjection or alliance. But under the fifth and best-known of the dynasty, Crœsus, the Lydian empire was brought to a sudden end by the Persian conqueror Cyrus, who in 546 B. C. captured Sardes and the king himself. From the Persians Lydia passed over, through Alexander the Great, to Syria, and later to Eumenes of Pergamum. During the Roman period Lydia formed a separate province, with Sardes as capital. Sardes was a prominent episcopal see (compare Rev. iii. 1), but was destroyed by Timur in 1402 A. D. Lydia is now a Turkish province, with the cities Smyrna, Manissa (the classical Magnesia), and Aidin. To the Lydians is ascribed the invention of coins, and the oldest coins thus far found are those of Lydia.

Lyly (lil'i), John. Born in the Weald of Kent about 1554: died at London, Nov., 1606. An English dramatist and novelist. He graduated at Oxford (Magdalen College) in 1573; went to London, where he entered upon literary work and endeavored to establish himself at court; championed the bishops in the "Martin Marprelate" controversy; and became a member of Parliament in 1589 (reëlected in 1593, 1597, and 1601). His principal work is "Euphues, or the Anatomy of Wit" (which see), which brought into prominence the affected style named from it "Euphuism." In the Marprelate controversy he wrote "Pappe with a Hatchet, etc." He also wrote a number of plays, including "Alexander and Campaspe," "Sapho and Phao," "Endimion, the Man in the Moon," etc.

Lyly's two secrets are in the first place an antithesis more laboured, more monotonous, and infinitely more pointless than Macaulay's—which antithesis seems to have met with not a little favour, and was indeed an obvious expedient for lightening up and giving character to the correct but featureless prose of Ascham and other "Latiners." The second was a fancy which amounts to a mania for similes, strung together in endless lists, and derived as a rule from animals, vegetables, or minerals, especially from the Fauna and Flora of fancy. It is impossible to open a page of "Euphues" without finding an example of this eccentric and tasteless trick, and in it, as far as in any single thing, must be found the recipe for euphuism pure and simple. As used in modern language for conceited and precious language in general, the term has only a very partial application to its original, or to that original's author. Indeed Lyly's vocabulary, except occasionally in his similes, is decidedly vernacular, and he very commonly mingles extremely homely words with his highest flights.

It was united to France by Philip the Fair in 1307.

Lyons (lī'onz), F. Lyon (lē-ôṅ'). The capital of the department of Rhône, France, situated at the junction of the Saône with the Rhone, in lat. 45° 46′ N., long. 4° 49′ E.: the ancient Lugdunum. It is the third city in France, a fortress, and a great railway, commercial, and manufacturing center. It has the largest silk manufactures in the world. The cathedral, chiefly of the 12th and 13th centuries, has an exceedingly impressive interior. There are double aisles, and fine roses in both transepts and in the west front. The medieval glass is magnificent, and the tracery illustrates the entire development of medieval architecture. The exterior is much masked by abutting buildings, but is admirable where visible. The churches of Notre Dame de Fourvières (modern), of Ainay (chiefly Romanesque), and of St.-Nizier, the hôtel de ville, the palais des arts (containing picture-galleries, sculpture, antiquities, natural-history collections, marbles), the bourse, and the Académie Universitaire (with 5 faculties) are noteworthy. Lyons was founded by Greeks in 560 B. C.; was developed especially by the Roman consul Plancus 41 B. C.; was the capital of Lugdunensis; was made by Claudius a Roman colony; was the capital of the first Burgundian kingdom, and afterward passed to the Franks; was plundered by the Saracens in the 8th century; came under the power of the Archbishop of Lyons; and was united to France at the beginning of the 11th century. Two important councils were held there (1245 and 1274). Its silk industry suffered from the revocation of the Edict of Nantes in 1685. Revolting against the Convention, it was besieged in 1793 and partly destroyed by Collot d'Herbois. Since then it has been the scene of several insurrections, especially in 1834. A great inundation visited it in 1856. It was the birthplace of Claudius, Caracalla, Suchet, and Ampère. Population (1901), 453,145.

Mab (mab), Queen. [Orig. Ir. Medb, 'queen' of Connaught, mentioned in Irish poems about the year 1100. The ordinary etym. from W. mab, a child, has no basis of fact. See Mabinogion.] In fairy and folk lore, the fairies' midwife. She is first mentioned as Queen Mab in Shakspere's "Romeo and Juliet," i. 4. Drayton introduces her in his "Nymphidia," written several years later, and Ben Jonson in his "Entertainment of the Queen and Prince at Althrope." Shakspere represents her not only as adroit in all kinds of teasing and mischief, but as the hag Nightmare herself. She is the fairies' midwife — that is, the fairy whose duty it is to deliver the fancies of men and to produce dreams by driving over the sleeper in her chariot. Titania, the fairy queen, is not the same person. In Shelley's "Queen Mab" she has a wider sphere, and is made to rule over men's thoughts.

Maba (mä'bä). The largest tribe of Wadai, living in the northern portion of central Sudan, Africa. It is of Nigritic stock, largely Mohammedan, and composed of 22 tribes (Kodoi, Malanga, Madaba, Matlamba, Kondongo, Kadjanga, Karanga, etc.), all speaking different dialects of Maba, which is understood beyond its own territory. Maba slaves used to be exported to the east coast, while their neighbors went to the west coast. The ruler of Wadai must be born of a Maba woman.

His works include "Acta sanctorum ordinis S.-Benedicti" (1668–1702), "Vetera analecta" (1675–85), "De re diplomatica" (1681), "Musæum Italicum" (1687–89), etc.

Mabinogion (mab-i-nō'gi-on), The. The fairy tales and romances of the Welsh. See the extract.

> Mabinogion is the plural of the Welsh word mabinogi, which means instruction for the young — the word being derived from mab, a child, and the same root running through many words with a like sense, Queen Mab herself included. . . . The great collection of these tales is at Jesus College, Oxford, in a MS. volume of the fourteenth century, known as the Red Book of Hergest, of which the tales have been published, both in the original Cymric and in a delightful English translation, as the Mabinogion, by Lady Charlotte Guest (now Schreiber), who takes the word Mabinogion as simply meaning stories for the young. The Mabinogion thus represented contains Welsh versions of three of the French Arthurian romances by Chrestien de Troyes, namely, "The Lady of the Fountain," and among the notes to it the text of the "Chevalier au Lion," with which that story corresponds; "Peredur, the son of Evrawc," corresponding to the "Percival le Gallois" of Chrestien; and "Geraint, the son of Erbin," which is his "Erec and Enide." Besides these, in the Mabinogion are two British tales ascribed to the time of King Arthur, "Kilhwch and Olwen" and the "Dream of Rhonabwy." The rest are tales in which King Arthur does not appear, or is named only as by interpolation — namely, "Pwyll, Prince of Dyved"; "Branwen, the Daughter of Llyr"; "Math, the Son of Mathonwy"; these four being the sections which Professor Rhys regards as the foundation of the Mabinogion; the rest, being later editions, are, besides the Arthur romances already named, the "Dream of Emperor Maximus," "Lludd and Llevelys," and the romance of "Taliesin." Morley, English Writers, III. 257–259.

> Since the publication of Lady Charlotte Guest's edition of the Mabinogion the idea seems to prevail that any Welsh tale of respectable antiquity may be called a Mabinogi, plural Mabinogion, but there is no warrant for so extending the use of the word; and, of the eleven stories contained in Lady Charlotte Guest's collection, only four are entitled to be called Mabinogion. More strictly speaking, they are not Mabinogion so much perhaps as the "four branches of the Mabinogi." The word Mabinogi is derived from Mabinog, and that was a term belonging to the bardic system, meaning a sort of a literary apprentice or young man who was receiving instruction from a qualified bard; and the lowest description of Mabinog was one who had not acquired the art of making verse. The inference to be drawn is that Mabinogi meant the collection of things which formed the Mabinog's literary training and stock in trade, so to say. He was probably allowed to relate the tales forming the four branches of the Mabinogi at a fixed price, but he was usually a young man, not a child in the nursery, and it is utterly wrong to suppose the Mabinogion to be nursery tales. Rhys, Arthurian Legend, pp. 1, 2.

Mably (mä-blē'), Gabriel Bonnot, Abbé de. Born at Grenoble, France, March 14, 1709: died at Paris, April 23, 1785. A French publicist, elder brother of Condillac. For a time he was secretary to his uncle Cardinal Tencin, and was occupied with diplomatic affairs; but he soon gave up his office, and thereafter lived in retirement. He wrote "Parallèle des Romains et des Français" (1740), "Observations sur les Romains" (1751), "Observations sur l'histoire de France" (1765), "Droit publique de l'Europe" (1748), "Entretiens de Phocion" (1763), etc.

Mac. [Gael. mac, Ir. mac, W. map, mab, also ap, ab, a son, Goth. magus, a son.] An element, usually a conjoined prefix, in many Scotch and Irish names of Celtic origin, cognate with the Welsh Ap-, signifying 'son,' and being thus equivalent to the Irish O', the English -son or -s, and the Norman Fitz-. The prefix is either written in full, Mac-, or abbreviated to Mc- or Mc., which in works printed in the British Isles almost invariably appears as M'— the abbreviated form being followed by a capital letter, while Mac- takes a capital after it but rarely. Thus a name may be variously spelled as Macdonald (rarely MacDonald), McDonald, or M'Donald; so Mackenzie, McKenzie, or M'Kenzie, etc. In alphabetical lists, names with this prefix, however written, are properly entered in the place of Mac-.

Macbeth. A tragedy by Shakspere. recorded production is April 20, 1610, but it is t to have been played before, and revised by spere in 1606. It is thought to have been r to the form of the 1623 folio by Middleton 1622 (Fleay). The story is from Holinshed. produced an adaptation printed in 1674 — not 1673, as ally said, which is probably Betterton's version (Fu It is not known precisely when it was first produc probably before 1664. It was more like an oper music by Matthew Lock, and it held the stage till restored the Shakspere version. In 1773 Mackl dressed Macbeth in his native costume: Garrick h accustomed to wear the uniform of a military of the time. The character of Macbeth is that of a acquired though not constitutional courage, temp ambition to treachery and murder. Before he comm crime he wavers and shudders at both end and but, once made resolute through the courage of h he goes forward to subsequent murders through discovery and defeat. "Lady Macbeth, like all in spere, is a class individualized: of high rank, left alone, and feeding herself with day-dreams of am she mistakes the courage of fantasy for the power ing the consequences of the realities of guilt. Macedonia (mas-ē-dō'ni-ā). [Gr. Makedonia.] In ancient geography, a country of southeastern Europe, of vague limits. It lay north of the Ægean Sea and Thessaly, east of Illyria, and west of Thrace, separated from Illyria by the Scardus Mountains. The chief rivers were the Axius (Vardar) and Strymon; the chief cities, Edessa, Pella, and Thessalonica. Macedonia was not originally a part of Hellas. It first became powerful under Philip. (See Macedonian Empire.) Its possession was contested by Alexander's successors, and was finally obtained by Antigonus Gonatas about 278. The Macedonians were defeated by Rome at Cynoscephalæ in 197, and finally at Pydna in 168, and Macedonia was made a Roman province in 146. It is now a part of Turkey, its inhabitants being chiefly Bulgarians, Greeks, and Turks.

Macedonia. A diocese in the southern part of the later Roman prefecture of Illyricum (Macedonia, Epirus, and Greece).

Macedonian (mas-ē-dō′ni-an) Empire. The empire built up by Philip (who reigned 359–336 B. C.) and Alexander the Great (336–323). It included at its greatest extent Macedonia, Greece, Thrace, Asia Minor, Syria, Egypt, Mesopotamia, Babylonia, Assyria, part of Armenia, and the countries comprised in the modern Persia, Afghanistan, Baluchistan, western India, and a large part of central Asia. The empire was divided under Alexander's successors — the chief divisions being Macedonia, Egypt, Syria, Pergamum, Bithynia, Rhodes, and Greek states.

Macedonians (mas-ē-dō′ni-anz). 1. The natives or inhabitants of ancient Macedonia. The Macedonians, the conquerors of Greece and of many other countries, have generally been regarded as not Hellenes, or genuine Greeks, although they used the Greek language.

West of the Thracian district in antiquity was the abode of the Macedonians, whose language, in spite of the scanty remains in which it is preserved to us, shows itself undoubtedly to be Greek and nearly related to Doric. There has then rightly been a tendency, gathering strength of late, to regard the tribe of the Macedonians as the portion, left behind in the north, of the Greek people, whose original abode was at the foot of Olympus, and perhaps even further north still.

Schrader, Aryan Peoples (tr. by Jevons), p. 431.

2. The followers of Macedonius, bishop of Constantinople in the 4th century, who denied the distinct existence and Godhead of the Holy Spirit, which he conceived to be a creature or merely a divine energy diffused through the universe. Members of this sect were also known as Marathonians and Pneumatomachi. The Semi-Arians were often called by this name, and the name of Semi-Arians was also given to the Macedonians in the proper sense.

Macedonian Wars. Wars between Rome and Macedonia: (1) 214–205 B. C., when Philip V. fought in alliance with Carthage; (2) 200–197, when Philip V. was defeated by Flamininus at Cynoscephalæ (197); (3) 171–168, when Perseus was defeated by Æmilius Paulus at Pydna (168); (4) 149–148, soon after which Macedonia was made a Roman province.

Macedonius (mas-ē-dō′ni-us). Died about 360. Patriarch of Constantinople. He was ordained by the Arian party in 341, and deposed in 360.

Macerata (mä-chä-rä′tä). 1. A province in the compartimento of the Marches, Italy. Area, 1,087 square miles. Population (1891), 242,479. — 2. The capital of the province of Macerata, situated in lat. 43° 18′ N., long. 13° 26′ E. It has a university and a cathedral. Population (1891), estimated, 23,000.

Maceroni (It. pron. mä-chä-rō′nē), Francis. Born at Manchester in 1788: died at London, July 25, 1846. An English inventor and military adventurer. He was of Italian extraction; was an aide-de-camp, with the rank of colonel, to Murat, king of Naples, in 1814; and afterward received the rank of brigadier-general in the service of the Republic of Colombia, for which he procured supplies of men and arms at Paris and London. He invented an improved steam-coach for common roads, which was, however, rendered valueless by the introduction of railways. He published "Interesting Facts Relating to the Fall and Death of Joachim Murat, King of Naples" (1817).

Machault, or Machaut (mä-shō′), Guillaume de. Born about 1284: died after 1370. A French poet and musician. Chaucer's indebtedness to him is marked. "A native of Champagne and of noble birth, he early entered, like most of the lesser nobility of the period, the service of great feudal lords. He was chamberlain to Philip the Fair, and at his death became the secretary of John of Luxembourg, the well-known king of Bohemia. After the death of this prince at Crécy, he returned to the service of the court of France and served John and Charles V., finally, as it appears, becoming in some way connected with Pierre de Lusignan, king of Cyprus. His works were very numerous, amounting in all to some 80,000 lines, of which, until recently, nothing but a few extracts was in print. In the last few years, however, 'La Prise d'Alexandrie,' a rhymed chronicle of the exploits of Lusignan, and the 'Voir Dit,' a curious love-poem in the style of the age, have been printed. Besides these, his works include numerous ballades, etc., and several long poems in the style of those of Froissart." Saintsbury, French Lit., p. 102.

(31) Madonna della Scodella ('of the little bowl'): a painting by Correggio, in the Pinacoteca at Parma, Italy. It is an episode of rest during the flight into Egypt, described as a painted poem of family happiness, beautiful in light, color, and thought, and with accompaniment of Correggio's charming angels. (32) Madonna della Misericordia ('of pity'), the Virgin interceding for the people of Lucca: a beautiful painting by Fra Bartolommeo, in the Palazzo Pubblico at Lucca, Italy. Christ appears above, a majestic figure. (33) Madonna del Cardellino ('of the thistle-finch'): a painting by Raphael, in the Uffizi, Florence. The Virgin, graceful and of very sweet expression, sits on a mossy bank, with the child Christ and St. John at her knee. (34) Madonna del Baldacchino ('of the canopy'): a painting by Raphael, in the Galleria Pitti, Florence. The Virgin is enthroned in a domed niche, beneath a canopy whose draperies are supported by two long-robed angels. The Child sits smiling on her knee, playing with his toes. Several saints are in attendance. (35) A painting by Cimabue (1270), in Santa Maria Novella, Florence. It was the most notable painting of its day, and when finished was borne to the church in a popular procession. The Virgin is enthroned, with the Child on her knee, and six attendant angels, the whole on a gold ground. Some of the Byzantine stiffness and conventionality remains, but in expression and in naturalness of drapery and movement the picture justifies the admiration it excited. (36) Madonna with two Angels playing on musical instruments: an altarpiece by Giovanni Bellini, in Santa Maria dei Frari at Venice. The side compartments contain St. Benedict and St. Nicholas, each with a companion. (37) Madonna of Pesaro: a votive picture over 17 feet high, by Titian, in Santa Maria dei Frari at Venice. In technical perfection and splendor of color this is one of Titian's finest paintings. The seated Madonna, holding the Child on her knee, inclines graciously toward the kneeling donor of the picture, the senator Benedetto Pesaro, in presence of St. Francis, St. Anthony of Padua, and St. Peter, and of other dignitaries of the Pesarl. (38) Madonna of the Green Cushion: a painting by Andrea Solario of Milan, in the Louvre, Paris. The Virgin, her head shrouded in white, is suckling the Child, who lies on a green pillow. The landscape background is pleasing, and the color very brilliant. (39) Madonna del Coniglio ('of the rabbit'): a celebrated painting by Titian, in the Louvre, Paris. The Virgin is seated on the ground with her hand on a white rabbit, to the delight of the infant Christ, who is held by St. Catharine. (40) Madonna della Vittoria: a beautiful painting by Mantegna, in the Louvre, Paris. The Virgin, holding the infant Christ, sits in an overarched bower, between SS. Michael and Maurice; in front are St. Elizabeth with St. John, and Francesco Gonzaga of Mantua, kneeling, over whom the Virgin makes a gesture of blessing. A relief of the Fall of Man appears on the pedestal of the Virgin's throne. (41) Madonna with the Diadem: a painting by Raphael, in the Louvre, Paris. The Virgin, wearing a coronet, kneels, with the boy St. John beside her, and lifts the covering from the sleeping Child. (42) Madonna and Child with St. Anna: one of the finest paintings of Leonardo da Vinci, in the Louvre, Paris. The Virgin is seated in St. Anna's lap, and supports the Child, who is playing with a lamb, amid a fair landscape. (43) See Orléans Madonna.

Madras (ma-dras'). 1. A governorship and presidency of British India, comprising the eastern or Coromandel coast, a large part of the interior of the Deccan, and part of the western or Malabar coast. The principal mountains are the East and West Ghats; the chief rivers, the Godavari, Kaveri, and Kistna. The leading occupation is agriculture. Government is administered by a governor and council. The inhabitants are chiefly Hindus. This province was formed from the states of the Carnatic, Tanjore, parts of Mysore, etc., in the last half of the 18th century and the beginning of the 19th. Area, 141,189 square miles. Population (1891), 35,630,440.

2. The capital of Madras, situated on the coast in lat. 13° 4′ N., long. 80° 15′ E. Its commercial quarter is the Black Town. Madras is the third in importance of the seaports of British India; exports coffee, cotton, etc.; and is the seat of various societies and educational institutions. It was founded by Francis Day of the East India Company in 1639; was made a presidency in 1653; was unsuccessfully attacked by the natives in 1702 and 1741; was captured by Labourdonnais in 1746, and restored to the British in 1748; and was unsuccessfully besieged by the French in 1758–59. Its (exposed) roads are often visited by hurricanes, most disastrously in 1872. Population (1891), 452,518.

He is best known for his "Memorias para a historia da Capitania de S. Vicente" (Lisbon, 1797; Rio de Janeiro, 1847), a work of great historical value.

Madrid (ma-drid'; Sp. pron. mä-ᵺrᵺᵺ'). [Sp. Madrid, Ar. Majrît, ML. Majoritum.] 1. A province in New Castile, Spain. Area, 2,997 square miles. Population (1887), 682,644.—2. The capital of Spain and of the province of Madrid, situated on the Manzanares in lat. 40° 25′ N., long. 3° 42′ W. It stands on a plateau 2,150 feet above sea-level, nearly in the geographical center of Spain. The Church of San Francisco, finished in 1784, is a great rotunda, with a dome 163 feet high, an apse, and three domed chapels radially arranged on each side. The interior is remarkable for its spaciousness, and for its profuse decoration in sculpture and painting by modern masters. The royal palace, begun in 1737, is imposing from its great size and its fine situation on a lofty terrace above the river Manzanares. The royal armory is a unique collection of splendid medieval and Renaissance armor, arms, banners, and trappings, a large proportion of which was actually used by some of the most famous personages in Spanish history (Charles V., Philip II., Isabella the Catholic, the Gran Capitan, Pedro the Cruel, Don John of Austria, etc.). The bronze statue of Philip IV., by Montañes (19 feet high), in the Plaza del Oriente, cast in Florence in 1640, ranks as one of the finest equestrian statues existing: the horse prances, with no support but his own hind legs. The Museo del Prado, or Royal Museum, ranks as one of the great galleries of paintings of the world, excelling, more especially, in the masterpieces of Murillo and Velasquez. Madrid was a Moorish outpost; was taken from the Moors in 1083; became a favorite residence of Charles V., and was made the capital by Philip II. in 1560; was occupied by the French in 1808–13; and has been the scene of various insurrections (1868, etc.). Population (1897), 512,150.

Madura. 1. A district in Madras, British India, intersected by lat. 10° N., long. 78° E. Area, 8,808 square miles. Population (1891), 2,608,404.—2. The capital of the district of Madura, situated on the Vaigai in lat. 9° 55′ N., long. 78° 9′ E. The great temple here was built for the most part in the early 17th century. The inclosure forms a rectangle 720 by 840 feet, with a lofty pyramidal gopura or pylon in the middle of each face. The choltry, or columned hall, of Tirumulla Nayak (about 1650), built to receive the chief local divinity during his annual visit to the king, is 333 feet long and 105 wide, with 4 ranges of cruciform piers, all richly sculptured, and presents an imposing effect. The piers of the façade exhibit figures in the round of prancing horses resting their fore feet and bodies on groups of soldiers beneath them. Population (1891), 87,428.

Madvig (mäd′vig), Johan Nicolai. Born at Svaneke, Bornholm, Denmark, Aug. 7, 1804: died at Copenhagen, Dec. 13, 1886. A celebrated Danish philologist and statesman. He was professor at Copenhagen, at first (1829) of the Latin language and literature, and later of classical philology; minister of public worship 1848–51; and later inspector of public instruction. His chief works are a Latin grammar (1841), "Adversaria critica" (1871–73), "Die Verfassung und Verwaltung des römischen Staats" (1881), etc.

Mad World, A, my Masters. 1. A dialogue by Nicholas Breton, printed in 1603.—2. A play by Middleton, probably produced in 1606. It was printed in 1608. Mrs. Aphra Behn copied it in "The City Heiress," and it was used by Charles Johnson in "Country Lasses."

Mæcenas (mē-sē′nas), Caius Cilnius. Died 8 B. C. A Roman statesman and patron of literature. He was descended from an ancient Etruscan family, and belonged to the equestrian order. He appears in 40 as the agent of Octavianus (afterward emperor under the title of Augustus) in negotiating a marriage with Scribonia, daughter of Libo, the father-in-law of Sextus Pompeius. He was intrusted with the administration of Rome during the absence of Octavianus on an expedition against Pompeius in 36; and after the battle of Actium in 31, when Octavianus made himself master of the Roman world, urged him to establish an empire instead of restoring the republic. He remained, with Agrippa, the chief adviser of Augustus down to 16, when he became estranged from his master and retired to private life. He was the friend and patron of Horace and Vergil, and wrote a number of works, fragments only of which are extant.

Maerlant (mär′länt), Jacob (de Coster) van. Born probably at Maerlant, on the island of Voorne (date unknown): died at Damme, near Bruges, after 1291. A Flemish poet. He was apparently a sacristan in Maerlant, as is inferred from the title "de Coster" given him in one of his works. He became, ultimately, town clerk at Damme, where he died, and where a statue has been erected to him. He was the founder of the didactic school of poetry in the Netherlands. His principal work is the long poem (after a Latin original) "Spieghel Historiel" ("Mirror of History"), begun in 1283 and left uncompleted at his death. Among his other works are the romantic poems "Troyen" and "Alexander" (after French originals); "Der Naturen Bloeme" ("Flowers of Nature"), "Heimelijkheid der Heimelijkheiden" ("The Secret of Secrets"), "Rijmbijbel" ("Rime Bible")—all after Latin originals; a strophic dialogue, "Wapene Martijn"; and the poem "Van den Lande van over Zee" ("Of the Lands over the Sea"), a summons to the Crusades. He has been called "the father of Dutch poets."

Maestricht, or Maastricht (mäs′trićht), G. Mastricht (mäs′trićht). The capital of the province of Limburg, Netherlands, situated on the left bank of the Meuse, in lat. 50° 51′ N., long. 5° 42′ E.: the Roman Trajectum Superius, and medieval Trajectum ad Mosam. It has flourishing manufactures and trade. Formerly it was a very strong fortress. The chief attractions are the old church of St. Servatius, and in the vicinity the Petersberg sandstone quarries. It was a Roman town, and later frequently a Frankish royal residence; was afterward held by the dukes of Brabant and bishops of Liège; was taken by Alexander of Parma in 1579, by Prince Frederick Henry of Orange in 1632, by the French in 1673 and 1748, and again by the French under Kléber in 1794; and was held by the Dutch against the Belgians in 1830. Population (1890), 32,676.

Maeterlinck (met′ėr-lingk), Maurice (Mooris). Born in 1864. A noted Belgian poet. He went to Paris in 1886, where he came under the influence of Villiers de l'Isle-Adam. [Sp. Fernando de Magallanes; F., G., and E. generally Ferdinand Magellan.] Born at Saborosa, Traz-os-Montes, Portugal, about 1480: died on the island of Mactan, Philippines, April 27, 1521. The discoverer of the Strait of Magellan and of the Philippine Islands. He served with the Portuguese in the East Indies 1505–12, and in Morocco in 1514. He complained that his services were not properly rewarded, and formally renounced allegiance to Portugal in 1517; went to Spain; and, in conjunction with Ruy Faleiro, another Portuguese, offered to find for Spain a western passage to the Moluccas, maintaining that those islands were outside of the hemisphere which, by treaty, had been assigned to Portugal for conquest. (See Tordesillas.) Charles V. accepted the plan, and fitted out for the expedition a government squadron of 5 ships and 265 men. At first Magalhães and Faleiro were made joint commanders, but later Faleiro was separated from the expedition, and Magalhães remained in full command. The squadron sailed from San Lucar, Sept. 20, 1519, and touched at Madeira. Soon after the veedor, or inspector, Juan de Cartagena, refused to obey commands, and was arrested. He bequeathed to the grand duke a valuable collection of manuscripts and early editions, which now forms part of the Biblioteca Nazionale at Florence.

Magna Charta, or Magna Carta (mag'nä kär'tä). The great charter of the liberties (Magna Charta Libertatum) of England, granted and sealed by King John in a conference between him and his barons at Runnymede, June 15, 1215. Its most important articles are those which provide that no freeman shall be taken, or imprisoned, or proceeded against, except by the lawful judgment of his peers or in accordance with the law of the land, and that no scutage or aid shall be imposed in the kingdom (except certain feudal dues from tenants of the crown), unless by the common council of the kingdom. The remaining and greater part of the charter is directed against abuses of the king's power as feudal superior. The charter granted by Henry III. is only a confirmation of that of his father, King John.

Magna Græcia (mag'nä grē'shiä). [L., 'great Greece.'] In ancient geography, the name given to the part of southern Italy colonized by Greeks. Mago. Died 203 B. C. (about 193 B. C. ?). A Carthaginian general, younger brother of Hannibal. He accompanied his brother to Italy 218 B. C., supported Hasdrubal in Spain 215 B. C., and was defeated by Scipio at Silpia 206 B. C.

Magog. See the extract, and Gog.

For an explanation of Magog we must go to the prophet Ezekiel. He tells us (xxxviii. 2) that Magog was the land of Gog, "the chief prince" of Tubal and Meshech. Gog is the Gugu of the Assyrian inscriptions, the Gyges of the Greeks; and in Magog, therefore, we must see a title of Lydia. The name is evidently a compound of that of Gog; perhaps it represents the Assyrian Mat Gugi, or 'country of Gugu.' Sayce, Races of the O. T., p. 45.

Magoon (ma-gön'), Elias Lyman. Born at Lebanon, N. H., Oct. 20, 1810: died at Philadelphia, Nov. 25, 1886. An American Baptist clergyman and writer. His works include "Orators of the American Revolution" (1848), "Republican Christianity" (1849), etc.

Mahabharata (mą-hä-bhä′rą-tą). [Mahābhārata-ākhyāna, great Bharata story; or, more briefly, Mahabharata.] The name of one of the two great epics of ancient India, the other being the Ramayana. It contains over 100,000 distichs, divided into 18 parvans ('knots' or 'joints,' and then 'sections,' 'chapters'). It is about eight times as large as the Iliad and Odyssey together. The tales originally composing it were probably first circulated in prose, and put later into metrical form. They may have existed several centuries before our era, but there is no satisfactory evidence as to their date. Neither is there better as to their authors. They are ascribed to Vyasa, "the arranger," called also Krishna Dvaipayana; but as the same Vyasa is the reputed compiler of the Vedas, Puranas, and other works, no historical value can be attached to the detail. Scarcely a fourth of the poem is taken up by the main narrative. The rest consists of inserted episodes and diverse accretions, which are, aside from minor additions, either narratives of the ancient or mythical history of India, theogony and cosmogony, or didactic and dogmatic matter. To the first class belong the episodes of Nala and Shakuntala, to the third the Bhagavadgita. Thus through constant accretion the Mahabharata became a sort of encyclopedia of India, intended by the Brahmanic authors for the Kshatriya or military caste. Krishna Dvaipayana is said to have taught the poem to his pupil Vaishampayana, who recited it at a festival before King Janamejaya. The leading subject is the great war between the Kauravas and the Pandavas, who were descendants through Bharata from Puru, the ancestor of one branch of the lunar race. The following is a brief summary of the main story: The two brothers Dhritarashtra and Pandu were brought up in their royal home at Hastinapura, about 60 miles northeast of Delhi. Dhritarashtra, the elder, being blind, Pandu became king. Pandu had 5 sons — Yudhishthira, Bhima, and Arjuna by Kunti, and Nakula and Sahadeva by Madri. These are called the Pandavas, and are types of heroic excellence. Dhritarashtra had 100 sons, of whom the chief was Duryodhana. These are called the Kauravas, and are represented as altogether bad. After Pandu's death the Pandavas were brought up with the Kauravas by Dhritarashtra, who made his nephew Yudhishthira heir apparent. Yudhishthira's exploits having excited the ill will of the Kauravas, the Pandavas went to the King of Panchala, whose daughter Draupadi became their common wife. After this alliance, in order to reconcile the feud, Dhritarashtra divided his kingdom, giving Hastinapura to his sons, and to his nephews a district in the southwest, where they built Indraprastha, the modern Delhi. Here the Pandavas lived for a time happily under the rule of Yudhishthira. Once, however, Dhritarashtra held at his capital a great assembly to which came the Pandavas. In a game of dice with Duryodhana, Yudhishthira lost wealth, kingdom, brothers, and wife, when by a compromise the Pandavas agreed to give up their portion of the kingdom for 12 years and remain incognito for a thirteenth. They retired with Draupadi to the Kamyaka forest on the Sarasvati, and dwelt there 12 years. In the fourteenth year they demanded their possessions, but in vain; hence the great war, in which they overthrew the reigning house, slew Duryodhana, and got back their kingdom. In the present poem the story of the combat is extended through several books. When Yudhishthira is crowned in Hastinapura, Bhishma, leader of the Kauravas, though mortally wounded, instructs him on the duties of kings through 20,000 distichs and then dies. In the 17th book the Pandavas renounce the kingdom, and in the 18th, the last, they ascend to heaven with Draupadi. (For a fuller account, see Monier-Williams's "Indian Wisdom," xiii. xiv.) The complete text of the Mahabharata has been printed at Bombay and at Calcutta. An attempt at a complete translation into French by Fauche was interrupted by his death. This translation is in many respects untrustworthy. Several episodes have been often translated into various modern languages, notably the Nala and the Bhagavadgita (which see).

Maimonides (mī-mon′i-dēz) (Moses ben Maimun, also called Maimuni or, after the initials of his name (Rabbi Moses ben Maimun), Rambam: in Arabic, Abu Amram Musa ben Maimun Obaid Allah). Born at Cordova, Spain, in 1135: died in 1204. The most celebrated Jewish scholar, philosopher, and writer of the middle ages. In him the scientific development of Judaism in Spain reached its climax. He brought order and system into the chaotic masses of Talmudic literature, pointed out the aims and directions of religio-philosophical studies, and brought — as far as this can be done — Judaism and philosophy into harmony. His family had to fly before the persecutions of the Almohades to Fez, where for many years they were obliged to conceal their religion. Here Moses became, by association with Mohammedan scholars, thoroughly acquainted with the Aristotelian philosophy. In 1165 the family emigrated from Fez by way of Palestine to Egypt, and settled in Fostat (old Cairo), where the father of Maimun died. Moses first supported the family by trading in jewels. He next devoted himself to medicine, and subsequently became physician to Saladin's successor. At the same time he was chief rabbi of Cairo. Of his writings may be mentioned a short scientific treatise on the Jewish calendar, and another on the terms used in logic ("Milloth higgayon"), written before his twenty-third year. In 1168 he produced his first great work, a commentary on the Mishnah, written in Arabic. His greatest and most comprehensive work, on which he labored for ten years (1170–80), is the "Repetition of the Law" ("Mishneh Torah"), also called the "Strong Hand" ("Yad Hahazqah"), written in Hebrew. It is a masterly, systematic exposition in 14 books of the whole of the Jewish law as contained in the Pentateuch and the vast Talmudical literature. It was preceded by a small Arabic introduction, "Book of the Commandments" ("Sefer ha-Miçvoth"), containing a treatise on the 613 precepts of the law. His philosophical work par excellence is the "Guide of the Perplexed" ("Dalalt al Hairin": Hebrew "More Nebuchim"), written in Arabic. It is divided into three parts. The first treats of the anthropomorphic expressions found in the Bible, and of the religio-philosophical sects; the second of eternity and the creation of the world; the third contains a rational explanation of the commandments of Scripture. Of his lesser writings may be mentioned "An Epistle on Apostasy" ("Iggereth ha-Shemad"), in which he contends that Islam is not as bad as paganism, and that the feigned accommodation to it was not absolutely culpable; "An Epistle to Yemen" ("Iggereth Teman"), an exhortation to the Jews in South Arabia not to be led astray by false Messiahs; "A Treatise of Moses" ("Pirke Mosheh") on medical subjects; "A Treatise on Happiness" ("Perakim be-Haçlachah"); and "A Treatise on the Unity of God" ("Ma'amar ha-Yihud"). He was also the first to condense the dogmatical tenets of Judaism into 13 articles of faith, which found a place in the Jewish liturgy. His writings caused bitter disputes. He was condemned by many as a heretic, and his works were burned. But at last he was recognized as "the light of the West" (ner ha-ma'arbi) and "the great eagle" (ha-neser hagadôl), and the saying was applied to him that "from Moses (the lawgiver) unto Moses (Maimonides) there has been none like unto Moses."

Maine. [In the charter granted by Charles I. in 1639 named "The Province or Countie of Mayne," because regarded as a part of "the Mayne Lande of New England."] The northeasternmost State of the United States of America, and one of the New England States. Capital, Augusta; chief city, Portland. It is bounded by the province of Quebec on the north, New Brunswick on the east, the Atlantic on the southeast and south, and New Hampshire and Quebec on the west, extending from lat. 43° 4′ to 47° 28′ N., and from long. 66° 57′ to 71° 7′ W. The surface is hilly, and in the northwest and north mountainous, the highest summit being Mount Katahdin. The chief lake is Moosehead Lake; the chief rivers, the Saco, Androscoggin, Kennebec, Penobscot, and St. John. The coast-line is deeply indented. The State contains many places of summer resort. The leading occupations are agriculture, fishing, lumbering, ship-building, and commerce. Among the chief products are lumber, ice, building-stone, and cotton goods. It is the second State in the Union in fisheries. It has 16 counties, sends 2 senators and 4 representatives to Congress, and has 6 electoral votes. It was early visited by the Cabots, Verrazano, Gosnold, Pring, and other explorers. Attempts at colonization were made by the French under Du Monts in 1604, and by the English in 1607. The first permanent settlement dates from about 1623. Maine was merged in the "province of Massachusetts Bay" in 1691, and became a separate State in 1820. A boundary dispute with Great Britain was settled in 1842. The "Maine liquor law" was passed in 1851. There was a dispute for the governorship between the Republicans and the "Fusionists" (Democrats and Greenbackers) 1879–80. Area, 33,040 square miles. Population (1900), 694,466.

Maine. A United States battleship, blown up in the harbor of Havana, Feb. 15, 1898. She was of 6,682 tons displacement, and was launched in 1890. The naval court of inquiry appointed by the United States government reported (March 22) that "the Maine was destroyed by the explosion of a submarine mine, which caused the partial explosion of two or more of her forward magazines."

Maintenon (mañt-nôṅ'). A small town in the department of Eure-et-Loir, France, situated on the Eure 37 miles west-southwest of Paris. It was a place of some importance in the time of Louis XIV. and Louis XV.

Maintenon, Françoise d'Aubigné, Marquise de. Born in a prison at Niort, France, Nov. 27, 1635: died at St.-Cyr, near Versailles, April 15, 1719. The second wife of Louis XIV. She was the granddaughter of Agrippa d'Aubigné, and the daughter of Constant d'Aubigné who was imprisoned as a malcontent. On the death of her mother she found herself in abject poverty, and was married in 1652 to the kind-hearted wit and poet Scarron, who offered either to pay for her entrance to a convent or to make her his wife. She lived nine years with him, and their salon was frequented by the intellectual society of the time. In 1660 he died, and left her again in poverty. Her pension was discontinued in 1666 at the death of Anne of Austria, who had augmented it, and it was not till 1669 that Madame de Montespan gave her the charge of her son by Louis XIV. She was given a large income and a house at Vaugirard in which to bring up this child and another, born later, in secrecy. She was devoted to them, and established an ascendancy over the heart of the king, who advanced her to various positions in the court. In 1674 she purchased the estate of Maintenon, and in 1678 the king made it a marquisate. In 1685, two years after the death of the queen, Madame Maintenon married Louis privately. Her influence was almost unbounded in matters both of church and state, and she was a patroness of letters and the fine arts. Her somewhat questionable position induced her to behave with rigid propriety, and her reputation for orthodoxy was extreme. She founded a home for the daughters of poor gentlemen at St.-Cyr, and on the death of the king she retired there for the rest of her life.

Mainz (mīnts), F. Mayence (mä-yoṅs'), E. sometimes Mentz (ments). The capital of the province of Rhine-Hesse, Hesse, situated on the left bank of the Rhine, opposite the mouth of the Main, in lat. 50° N., long. 8° 16′ E.: the Roman Mogontiacum or Magontiacum. It is an important strategic point, and one of the strongest fortresses in Germany; has extensive commerce by the river and by railway, especially in wine; and has important manufactures, particularly of leather and furniture. The cathedral, one of the most interesting monuments of the Rhenish Romanesque, was founded in 975 on a different site. It has been repeatedly ruined by fire, and was finally restored much in its existing form after the fire of 1181. It is a large cruciform church, with pseudo-transepts at the west end also. Both east and west ends are flanked by towers, and larger polygonal arcaded towers surmount both crossings. The eastern apse, with its rich arcading beneath the roof and its curious gables, is highly picturesque. The main entrance is on the north side. The interior has been adorned with mural paintings designed by Veit: it contains a remarkable number of monumental tombs of all ages. There are many statues of emperors and electors, and some fine glass. The cathedral is 366 feet long and 150 wide; the vaulting is 89 high. The cloister is of the early 15th century. Other objects of interest are the electoral palace (with library, picture-gallery, and collections), statue of Gutenberg (a native of Mainz), Church of St. Stephen, and citadel. Mainz was a Celtic town and was the site of a Roman camp, and capital of Germania Superior. It was ruled by the archbishops (electors) of Mainz, except for a period of about 200 years, terminating in 1462, during which time it was a prominent member of the League of Rhenish Towns. It was called "the Golden Mainz." Formerly it had a university. It was conquered by the Swedes in 1631, and by the French in 1644 and 1688; was occupied by the French in 1792, retaken after a siege in 1793, ceded to France in 1801, and assigned to Hesse-Darmstadt in 1816. Population (1890), 72,059.

Mainz, Electorate of. One of the three ecclesiastical electorates of the Holy Roman Empire. The archbishopric of Mainz appears in the time of Boniface (about 750) as the most important in the eastern Frankish dominions. It was recognized as one of the seven electorates in 1356. In 1801 its possessions left of the Rhine were ceded to France. In 1803 Erfurt, Eichsfeld, and the Thuringian possessions were ceded to Prussia. Other possessions passed in 1803 to Hesse-Cassel, Hesse-Darmstadt, Nassau, etc. The coadjutor Dalberg received Ratisbon, Aschaffenburg, and Wetzlar, and the archiepiscopal dignity passed to Ratisbon. The elector renounced his possessions in 1813. In 1814–15 the recent territories of Mainz fell to Hesse-Darmstadt, Bavaria, Nassau, etc.

Maipo, or Maipu (mī'pō): often, but incorrectly, written and pronounced Maipú (mī-pō'). A river of Chile, crossing the province of Santiago about 7 miles south of Santiago City. It gave its name to a battle fought on a plain by its northern bank, April 5, 1818, in which 5,000 patriots under San Martin defeated 5,500 Spaniards under Osorio. The patriots lost 1,000 in killed and wounded, and 1,000 Spaniards were killed. Osorio escaped, but all his principal officers and 2,200 men surrendered. This victory retrieved the defeat of Cancha Rayada, and practically secured the independence of Chile.

It is a Corinthian hexastyle pseudoperipteros, with 11 columns on the flanks, on a raised basement with steps in front, and measures 40 by 76 feet, and 40 feet high. "It is constructed with the optical refinement of the curved horizontal lines hitherto considered peculiar to the Parthenon and other Greek temples of the 5th and 6th centuries B. C." (W. H. Goodyear, Amer. Jour. of Archæol., X. 1).

Maison Dorée, La (lä mā-zôṅ' dō-rā'). [F., 'the gilded house.'] A noted restaurant in Paris, situated on the Boulevard des Italiens. It was built by Lemaire in 1839.

Maisonneuve (mā-zo-nêv'), Jules Germain François. Born in 1809: died in 1894. A French surgeon, author of many surgical works.

Maisonneuve, Sieur de (Paul de Chomedey). Died at Paris, Sept. 9, 1676. Governor of Montreal 1642–64. He was a native of Champagne, entered the French army in his youth, and was the leader of a band of colonists who arrived at Quebec in 1641 and settled at Montreal in 1642. He remained governor of the colony at Montreal until 1664, when he was removed from office, and returned to France.

Maistre (mästr), Joseph Marie, Comte de. Born at Chambéry, Savoy, April 1, 1754: died at Turin, Feb. 26, 1821. A French statesman, writer, and philosopher. Joseph de Maistre was one of the greatest writers in the French language since the days of Voltaire and Rousseau. His family was of French origin, but this particular branch had settled in Savoy as early as the 17th century, and had sworn allegiance to the King of Sardinia. The eldest of ten children, he prepared to follow his father's calling and become a magistrate. On completing his classical studies under the Jesuits, he left home and took up the study of law in Turin. In 1788 he became senator of Savoy, but at no time was he in sympathy with the judiciary duties of his office. He emigrated at the time of the French Revolution, and spent several years in Switzerland and northern Italy. After residing some time in Sardinia in a diplomatic capacity, he finally went to St. Petersburg as envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the King of Sardinia (1802–17): this is by far the most brilliant period in his political and literary life. One of his earlier publications that had made his name known throughout Europe was the "Considérations sur la révolution française" (1796). During the period of his residence at the Russian capital he kept up a voluminous correspondence. He wrote an "Essai sur le principe générateur des institutions humaines" (1810), "Des délais de la justice divine" (1815), "Du pape" (1819), "De l'église gallicane" (1821), "Soirées de Saint-Pétersbourg" (1821), and "Examen de la philosophie de Bacon" (1835). On the exminister's return to Turin, the King of Sardinia bestowed numerous honors upon him. Joseph de Maistre's letters were edited many years after his death, and afford a valuable insight into the privacy of his thought and life. Two separate publications exist: "Lettres et opuscules du Comte Joseph de Maistre" (1851) and "Mémoires, tiques et correspondance diplomatique de Joseph de tre" (1858).

Maistre, Comte Xavier de. Born at Cham Savoy, Oct., 1764: died at St. Petersburg, 12, 1852. A Savoyard soldier and author, br of Joseph de Maistre. He served in youth in th of Piedmont, and, after the occupation of Piedmont French in 1798, took part in the Austrian and Russia paign in Italy (1799). In the same year he went to where he rose to the rank of major-general. He "Voyage autour de ma chambre" ("Journey rou Room," 1794, in the style of Sterne: written while arrest for taking part in a duel), "Le lépreux de d'Aoste" (1812), "La jeune Sibérienne" (1815), "Pris du Caucase" (1815), "Expédition nocturne autour chambre" (1825).

The chief merit of these works [of de Maistre], a less mannerised and more direct "Prisonniers du Ca and "Jeune Sibérienne," resides in their dainty s their singular narrative power (Sainte-Beuve says enough that the "Prisonniers du Caucase" has been e by no other writer except Mérimée), and in the rema charm of the personality of the author, which esc every moment from the work.

Malcontent, The. A play by Marston, acted in 1601, printed in 1604. Another edition, augmented by Webster, appeared the same year.

Then came Marston's completest work in drama, "The Malcontent," an anticipation, after Elizabethan fashion, of "Le Misanthrope" and "The Plain Dealer." Though not free from Marston's two chief vices of coarseness and exaggerated cynicism, it is a play of great merit, and much the best thing he has done, though the reconciliation, at the end, of such a husband and such a wife as Piero and Aurelia, between whom there is a chasm of adultery and murder, again lacks verisimilitude.
Saintsbury, Hist. of Elizabethan Lit., p. 198.

Malherbe (mäl-ärb′), François de. Born at Caen in 1555: died at Paris, Oct. 16, 1628. A celebrated French poet. His studies, begun in his native city, were continued at Paris, and completed at Basel and Heidelberg. He was married in 1581, and spent much of his time in southern France. One of his first compositions, "Les larmes de Saint-Pierre," was published at Paris in 1587. Before the close of the century he had written his ode to Dupérier entitled "Consolation sur la mort de sa fille," and had addressed odes to Henry IV. and Marie de Médicis. His ambition to become court poet was realized about 1605. He was presented to the king, and remained in residence at court till the death of Henry IV. in 1610, and was then further retained during the minority of Louis XIII. The best modern edition of his works is that of Ludovic Lalanne and Ad. Regnier for the "Collection des grands écrivains de la France" (Paris, 5 vols. 1862–69). Malherbe's claims to recognition lie in the nicety of his vocabulary, the purity of his expression, and the perfection of his verse. Boileau, in his "Art poétique," hailed him in the oft-quoted words: "Enfin Malherbe vint." Contemporaneous writers, however, surnamed Malherbe "le tyran des mots et des syllabes" ('the tyrant of words and syllables').

One of the stories represents him as advancing northward from Lake Titicaca, with a golden wand, which sank into the ground at the place where, warned by this sign, he founded the city of Cuzco. Another fable makes him one of four brothers who issued from a cave in the valley of the Vilcamayu. It is believed that Manco Capac was a real personage, probably the chief of a small tribe in the Vilcamayu valley, whence by force or policy he reached Cuzco (though he did not found it), and, acquiring the leadership there, laid the foundations of the Inca empire.

Manco (män′kō): called Manco Inca, Inca Manco, Manco Inca Yupanqui, and, incorrectly, Manco Capac or Ccapac II. Born about 1500: died 1544. Son of the Inca Huaina Ccapac of Peru, and brother of Huascar. After the death of Atahualpa and Huascar he was recognized by Pizarro (Nov., 1533) as the rightful sovereign of Peru, and was crowned at Cuzco; but he had no real power, and was virtually a prisoner. In April, 1536, he escaped, raised an army, and besieged Cuzco and other Spanish strongholds. Finally defeated in 1537, he retired to the mountains of Vilcabamba, whence he kept up a predatory warfare. He was killed by some fugitive followers of the younger Almagro who had taken refuge with him.

(mā'nē), or Manes (mā'nēz), or Manias (man-i-kē'us). The founder of Manichethe only source of information about him that is ratively credible is the Mohammedan tradition. He born 216–218 A. D., and received a careful education is father, Futak, at Ctesiphon. Futak connected him ter with the sect of the Moghtasilah, or 'Baptists,' them Babylonia, which had absorbed Christian eleand thus made his son acquainted with different of religion. Only at the age of 25 or 30 did Mani begin his new religion, and this he did at the court of I. He undertook long journeys into Transoxiana, ia China, and southward as far as India, and sent forth ies in the interest of his faith. Returning to the Persital in the last years of Sapor I. (about 270), he gained ess even at court, but was at last imprisoned and put th through the hostility of the Magians on whom the was dependent. Sapor's successor Hormuz seems to been more favorable, but Bahram I. abandoned Mani Magians and had him crucified in the year 276–277 Mani composed a number of works and epistles, were known to the Mohammedan historians, but w lost. The Fihrist reckons seven principal works in Syriac and one in Persian. The name of the Perork is not given in the extant form of the Fihrist, but ojectured that it may have been the Artang (pron. g), or 'Holy Gospel,' of which mention is made "Acta Archelai" and elsewhere among Western s. These "Acta," extant in a Latin translation from k original of which some extracts are preserved in Epiphanius, purport to describe a dispute between Archelaus, bishop of Carchar in Mesopotamia, and Manes. They are a ch of source of the Western tradition as to Manes, but, besides being of entirely uncertain authorship and date, bear upon their face marks indicating that they are only a polemic treatise put on literary grounds in the form of an alleged debate. They have the authority of a historical novel, not that of a history.

Manicheans, or Manichæans (man-i-kē'ąnz). The followers of Mani. See Mani. Manicheism was the old Babylonian religion of nature, modified by Christian and Persian elements, elevated into a gnosis, and subjecting human life to stringent regulation. According to Mani, a realm of light and a realm of darkness have always been opposed to each other. In the visible world both are mingled. The object of the world is to free the light from the intermingled darkness. Christ was sent for this end, but the apostles misrepresented his doctrine. This Mani was sent to restore. The object of Manichean ethics was to purify the elements of light and attain freedom from those of darkness; hence the three seals — those of the mouth, the hand, and the bosom. The first forbids unclean food, such as the flesh of animals and wine; the second, any traffic in things involving the elements of darkness; the third, every gratification of sexual desire, even marriage being forbidden. There was a rigorous system of fasts, Sunday being regularly and Monday generally so observed. The Manichean prayed 4 times a day, preceding each prayer by ablution, and turning toward the sun, the moon, or the north as the seat of light. The prayers were addressed to the God of light, to the whole kingdom of light, to the angels, and to Mani. The rigidity of the system was mitigated by distinguishing between the electi or perfecti (perfect Manicheans) and the catechumeni or auditores (the secular Manicheans). For the latter the stringency of the requirements was somewhat relaxed. The church had in all five gradations: (1) the teachers Mani and his successors; (2) the administrators, bishops; (3) the elders, presbyters; (4) the electi; and (5) the auditores. The worship was simple, and consisted of prayers, hymns, and ceremonies of adoration. Manicheism first gained a firm footing in Persia, Mesopotamia, and Transoxiana. The seat of its pope was for centuries at Babylon, and then at Samarkand. It penetrated the Roman Empire in the reign of Probus (about 280 A. D.), and spread rapidly after 330, finding its most numerous adherents in North Africa, Augustine being an auditor for nine years. Traces of Manicheism are found in the history of the Catholic Church until the 13th century.

Manlius Capitolinus (man'li-us kap'i-tō-lī'nus), Marcus. Died 384 B. C. The deliverer of the Capitol at Rome from the Gauls. He was a patrician by birth, and was consul in 392. According to tradition, he was aroused by the cackling of geese one night when the Gauls, who were besieging the Capitol under Brennus in 390, attempted to surprise the fortress, and, collecting a handful of men, repelled the attack. To this circumstance the origin of his surname Capitolinus is commonly ascribed, although it was also borne by his father and had already acquired the force of a family name in his gens. In 385 he began to champion the cause of the plebeians against the patricians, with a view to making himself tyrant of Rome, and in the following year was arrested by the dictator Camillus. He was tried in the Poetelinian grove, instead of on the Campus Martius, which commanded a view of the Capitol, and was sentenced to be thrown from the Tarpeian rock.

Manlius Imperiosus Torquatus (im-pē-ri-ō'sus tôr-kwā'tus), Titus. A Roman hero. He was a son of the dictator L. Manlius Capitolinus Imperiosus; was elected military tribune in 362 B. C.; and in 361 served under the dictator T. Quintius Pennus against the Gauls. During this campaign he slew a gigantic Gaul in single combat in the presence of the two armies, and despoiled him of a chain (torques), which he placed around his own neck (whence the surname Torquatus). He was appointed dictator in 353, and again in 349, and was consul in 347, 344, and 340. During his third consulship, while engaged with his colleague, P. Decius Mus, in a campaign against the Latins, he put to death his own son, who, contrary to orders, fought and killed in single combat an enemy from the opposing army.

Manlius Torquatus, Titus. Died 202 B. C. A Roman general. He was consul in 235 and 224, and dictator in 208. During his first consulship he conquered the Sardinians, after whose subjugation the Romans enjoyed a brief period of universal peace, the temple of Janus being closed for the first time since Numa Pompilius. He opposed the ransom of the prisoners taken by Hannibal at Cannæ in 216, and gained a decisive victory over the Carthaginians in Sardinia in 215.

Manon Lescaut (mä-nôṅ' les-kō'). A romance written by the Abbé Prévost, published in 1733, appended to "Memoirs of a Man of Quality."

But he [Prévost] would have been long forgotten had it not been for an episode or postscript of the "Mémoires" entitled "Manon Lescaut," in which all competent criticism recognises the first masterpiece of French literature which can properly be called a novel. Manon is a young girl with whom the Chevalier des Grieux, almost as young as herself, falls frantically in love. The pair fly to Paris, and the novel is occupied with the description of Manon's faithlessness—a faithlessness based not on want for Des Grieux, but on an overmastering desire for and comfort with which he cannot always supp The story, which is narrated by Des Grieux, and has a most pathetic ending, is chiefly remarkable perfect simplicity and absolute lifelikeness of th acter-drawing. Saintsbury, French Lit.,

Manu (ma'nō). In Sanskrit, man; man collectively; mankind; the Demiurge; one of a class of fourteen demiurgic beings, each of whom presides over a Manvantara, 'interval or period of a Manu.' The first in order of these is called Svayambhuva, as sprung from Svayambhu, the self-existent, identified with Brahma, who divided himself into two persons, male and female, whence was produced Viraj, and from him the first Manu. This Manu Svayambhuva is a sort of secondary creator. He produced ten Prajapatis, 'lords of creatures,' and these again seven other Manus. Of these the seventh, Manu Vaivasvata, 'the sun-born,' is the Manu of the present period, and is regarded as the progenitor of the present race of beings. He has been compared to Noah, from various legends of his preservation from a deluge by Vishnu, or by Brahma, in the form of a fish. He was the founder and first king of Ayodhya, afterward reigned over by Ikshvaku, his son, founder of the solar race. Manu Vaivasvata's daughter Ila married Budha, son of Soma, 'the moon,' and ancestor of the lunar race. To Manu Vaivasvata are ascribed the so-called "Laws of Manu" and a work on Vedic ritual. Upon the first seven are to follow seven other Manus.

Manu, Laws of. Until recently, the designation commonly employed for the Manavadharmashastra, which native tradition regarded as the law-book of Manu (see Manu), but which the scholars of to-day view as the law-book of the Manavans. The works constituting the Veda in its broader sense fall into the three classes of Sanhita, Brahmana, and Sutra, or text, exposition, and brief rule. Chief among the last are the Kalpasutras, or 'ceremony rules,' many important families having each its distinct Kalpasutra. This Kalpasutra was divided into Shrautasutra, 'rules for the fire sacrifices'; Grhyasutra, 'domestic usages'; and Dharmasutra, 'sacred law.' The Sutras are in mingled prose and verse; the Dharmashastras are a later metrical recast in the ordinary epic meter of antecedent Dharmasutras; and the Manavadharmashastra is such a recast of a Manavadharmasutra, or is the law-book of the Manavans. Out of clannish differences grew various Caranas, or 'schools,' in which Vedic traditions were handed down. The Manavans were a school of the Black Yajurveda. Of the Maitrayaniya branch of the schools of the Black Yajurveda there are still some survivors in western India who call their Sutras Manavasutras. The occasion of the recast was the development — beside the sectarian schools, which studied exclusively a single branch of the Veda — of non-sectarian schools, whose teachings claimed validity for all Aryans. These compiled from the only locally valid sectarian Sutras a school-book intended to be systematic, complete, and generally valid, and the Manavan Dharmasutra was chosen as its basis from the greatness of the name of the legendary Manu. By interpreting the title as 'of Manu,' they had an authoritative name to commend their work. Perhaps one half of the present work consists, however, of additions to the original, drawn from popular metrical maxims, and made, as Bühler thinks, at the date of the recast, which he considers to be between 100 B. C. and the 2d century A. D. (For a general account of the character and contents, see Williams's "Indian Wisdom," pp. 211–294. For the literature, see Lanman's "Sanskrit Reader" (Boston: Ginn and Co.), p. 340, from which the above view is taken.) It was first translated from the original by Sir William Jones. The most recent translations, accompanied by valuable introductions, are those of Bühler ("Sacred Books of the East," vol. xxv.) and Burnell (Trübner).

Manuel (man'ū-el). A tragedy by Charles Robert Maturin, produced at Drury Lane March 8, 1817, with Kean in the title rôle.

Manuel I. Comnenus. Born about 1120: died Sept. 24, 1180. Byzantine emperor 1143–80, son of the emperor Calo-Joannes. He permitted the Crusaders, under Conrad III., emperor of the Holy Roman Empire, and Louis VII. of France, to pass through his dominions in 1147, and in 1148 repelled an invasion of Greece by the Normans under Roger, king of Sicily. He was totally defeated by the Turks at Myriocephalus in 1176.

Manuel II. Palæologus. Died 1425. Byzantine emperor 1391–1425, son of John VII. Being besieged in Constantinople by the sultan Bajazet, he implored the aid of western Europe, and an army composed of the chivalry of France, Germany, and Hungary came to his assistance, but was totally defeated by the sultan at Nicopolis in 1396. Bajazet was, however, compelled to raise the siege in 1402 in order to meet the Tatar conqueror Timur, by whom he was defeated and captured at Angora. Manuel passed the subsequent years of his reign in peace, though in a state of semi-dependence on Mohammed, the son of Bajazet.

Man with Pinks. A noted painting by Jan van Eyck, in the Old Museum at Berlin. It is a bust portrait of a man wearing a fur-lined cloak and a high fur cap, and holding white pinks in one hand and red in the other.

Man with the Iron Mask, The. A French state prisoner, confined in the Bastille (where he died Nov 19, 1703), Pignerol, and other prisons in the reign of Louis XIV. His name was never mentioned, but he was buried under that of Marchiali, and he always wore a mask of iron covered with black velvet. He has been supposed to be (1) the Duke of Vermandois, a natural son of Louis XIV. and Mademoiselle de la Vallière; (2) an elder brother of Louis XIV., the son of Anne of Austria and the Duke of Buckingham; (3) a twin brother of Louis XIV.; (4) Count Matthioli, a minister of the Duke of Mantua, imprisoned for treachery; (5) a soldier of fortune named Marechiel, the head of a conspiracy to assassinate the king and his ministers. This last conjecture was considered the most reasonable until 1891, when Captain Bazeries, of the garrison of Nantes, published in the "Progrès de Nantes" (republished in "Le Temps," Aug. 7, 1891) a translation of some cipher despatches of Louis XIV. and of Louvois, apparently showing that the prisoner was Général de Bulonde, who raised the siege of Cuneo unnecessarily and compromised the success of the campaign. Louis shut him up at Pignerol for reasons of his own, instead of dooming him to the fate of a traitor, which was his due. Opinions still differ as to the identity of the prisoner.

Manx (mangks). The native language of the inhabitants of the Isle of Man, which belongs to the Gadhelic branch of the Celtic tongues, and is thus closely allied to the Irish and the Gaelic.

Manzoni (män-zō′nē), Alessandro. Born at Milan, March 7, 1785: died at Milan, May 22, 1873. A noted Italian novelist and poet, the chief of the Italian romantic school. He went in his early youth to Paris with his mother, who was a daughter of the Marquis Beccaria, and who introduced him to literary society. He became acquainted with Volney, Madame Condorcet, Fauriel, and others, and became imbued with many of their deistical and other opinions. In 1807 he returned to Italy, and was made a member of the Italian senate in 1860. He wrote the historical novel "I Promessi Sposi" (1825–27: translated into English as "The Betrothed Lovers"). Among his other works are the tragedies "Il Conte di Carmagnola" (1820), "Adelchi" (1823), the lyric poem "Il cinque Maggio" ("The 5th of May," an ode on Napoleon's death, 1821), "Inni sacri" (1810: sacred lyrics), "Osservazioni sulla morale cattolica" (a vindication of Catholic morality), "Storia della Colonna infame" (a historical treatise, 1842).

Maoris (mä′ō-riz or mou′riz). [From maori, lit. 'native,' 'indigenous.'] The primitive inhabitants of New Zealand, a Polynesian race of the Malay family, distinguished for their natural capacity and vigor. Most of them now profess Christianity, but they have vigorously though unsuccessfully resisted English dominion.

The Maoris, when first discovered by Europeans, were in a comparatively advanced stage of barbarism. Their society had definite ranks, from that of the Rangatira, the chief with a long pedigree, to the slave. Their religious hymns, of great antiquity, have been collected and translated by Grey, Taylor, Bastian, and others.

Map (map), or Mapes (māps), Walter. Born probably about 1140: died about 1210. A mediæval author and satirist. He was of a Welsh family in Herefordshire, and studied in Paris from about 1154 to 1160. He was present at the court of Henry II., while Thomas Becket was still chancellor, as one of the clerks of the royal household, and was employed as an itinerant justice. In 1179 Henry II. sent him to the Lateran Council at Rome. In 1197 he was made archdeacon of Oxford. The only undoubted work extant by Map is the "De nugis curialium" ("Courtiers' Trifling"), composed between 1182 and 1192. He has also been credited with a large share in the composition of the Arthurian romances, and it is probable that the "Lancelot" is based on an Anglo-French poem by him. A great part of the "Goliardic" or satirical verse of the 12th and 13th centuries is doubtless by Map.

Marcus Aurelius Antoninus (mär'kus â-rē'-li-us an-tō-nī'nus), originally Marcus Annius Verus, commonly known as Marcus Aurelius. Born at Rome, April 20, 121 A. D.: died in Pannonia, March 17, 180. A celebrated Roman emperor 161–180. He was the son of Annius Verus, and was a nephew of Antoninus Pius, by whom he was adopted in 138, and whom he succeeded as emperor in 161, with Lucius Verus, also an adopted son of Antoninus Pius, as his associate in the government. He was a pupil of the Stoic Cornelius Fronto, and is frequently called "the philosopher" on account of his devotion to philosophy and literature. In 162 Verus undertook an expedition against the Parthians, but soon abandoned himself to dissipation at Antiochia. His generals, however, stormed Artaxata, burned Seleucia and Ctesiphon, reconquered Mesopotamia, and enabled him to dictate terms of peace in 165. In 166 a war broke out with the Marcomanni and Quadi, which was continued with various fortunes during the rest of the reign of Aurelius. Verus died in 169, leaving his colleague sole emperor. In 175 the general Avidius Cassius organized a revolt in Syria, but was killed by his own officers in the same year. Aurelius died in Pannonia, either at Vindobona (Vienna) or at Sirmium, March 17, 180, after a wise and prosperous reign. He wrote a work in Greek, entitled "The Meditations of Marcus Antoninus." There is a bronze equestrian statue of Marcus Aurelius in the Piazza del Campidoglio, Rome, the finest piece of ancient bronze-work surviving. The emperor, simply robed, extends his arm in token of peace; the horse is of heavy build. It was set on its present pedestal by Michelangelo in 1538.

Marianne, ou les Aventures de la Comtesse de. . . . A novel by Marivaux, published in eleven volumes 1731–41.

Marianne has been said to be the origin of "Pamela," which is not exactly the fact. But it is certain that it is a remarkable novel, and that it, rather than the plays, gave rise to the singular phrase "Marivaudage," with which the author, not at all voluntarily, has enriched literature. The plot is simple enough. A poor but virtuous girl has adventures and recounts them, and the manner of recounting is extremely original. A morally faulty but intellectually admirable contemporary, Crébillon the younger, described this manner excellently by saying that the characters not only say everything that they have done and everything that they have thought, but everything that they would have liked to think but did not. Saintsbury, French Lit., p. 418.

Marina (mä-rē′nä). Born in Goazacoalco (Mexico) about 1501: died in Mexico after 1550. A Spanish name given to the Indian woman who became the mistress of Hernando Cortés, and was a prominent character in the conquest of Mexico. She was sold as a slave to the Tabascan Indians, and was one of the girls given by them to the Spaniards in 1519: owing to her knowledge of the Mexican language, she acted as interpreter. She bore several children to Cortés. In 1524 she was married to a Spanish captain named Juan Jaramillo. The name Marina was corrupted by the Indians to Malina, to which they added the titular suffix tzin, making Malintzin. This name was also given to Cortés.

Maritza (mä-rēt′sä). A river in Eastern Rumelia and European Turkey: the ancient Hebrus. It flows past Philippopolis and Adrianople, and empties into the Ægean Sea near Enos. Length, 270 miles. It is navigable in its lower course.

In 1364 the first encounter between the northern Christians and the invaders took place on the banks of the Maritza, near Adrianople, whither Louis I., king of Hungary and Poland, and the princes of Bosnia, Serbia, and Wallachia, pushed forward to put an end once for all to the rule of the Ottoman in Europe. Lala Shahin, Murad's commander-in-chief, could not muster more than half the number of troops that the Christians brought against him; but he took advantage of the state of drunken revelry in which the too confident enemy was plunged to make a sudden night attack, and the army of Hungary, heavy with sleep after its riotous festivities, was suddenly aroused by the beating of the Turkish drums and the shrill music of their fifes. The Ottomans were upon them before they could stand to arms. "They were like wild beasts scared from their lair," says the Turkish historian Sa'-ud-din; "speeding from the field of fight to the waste of flight, those abjects poured into the stream Maritza and were drowned." To this day the spot is called Sirf Sindughi, "Serbs' rout." Poole, Story of Turkey, p. 36.

His rivalry with Sulla caused the first civil war in 88. He was driven from Rome in that year, but returned, and with Cinna captured Rome in 87, and proscribed the aristocrats.

Marivaux (mä-rē-vō′), Pierre Carlet de Chamberlain de. Born at Paris, Feb. 4, 1688: died Feb. 12, 1763. A French dramatist and novelist. The plays he wrote previous to 1720 were distinct failures. His best work was done between 1722 and 1746: in that time he wrote some twenty-five plays, foremost among which stand "Le jeu de l'amour et du hasard" (1730), "L des mœurs" (1732), "Les fausses confidences" (173 legs" (1736), and "L'Épreuve" (1740). All Marivaux are more or less alike in their subject-matter. As Beuve remarks, the various situations are effect through outside events, but by the expression o feelings on the part of the different characters. culties arise entirely through the fault of the lovers selves, either in their curiosity, their timidity, th norance, their pride, or their pique. As a novelist vaux wrote "Marianne" (which see), his masterpiec "Le paysan parvenu" (1735) and "Pharamond, ou le romanesques" (1737). Marivaux's peculiar style ha named for him marivaudage. The term is now ge used in a depreciative sense. On the whole, Mari original in his conceptions, and may be ranked n Molière. Marmontel (mär-mōṅ-tel′), Jean François. Born at Bort, Limousin, July 11, 1723: died at Abbeville, Eure, Dec. 31, 1799. A French writer. He was brought up by the Jesuits, and destined for the church. In 1741 he was appointed substitute instructor in philosophy at Toulouse. His first piece of literary work, an ode (1743), proved a failure. Encouraged by Voltaire's sympathy, however, he came to Paris, and took several prizes in literary competition (1745–47). He wrote several tragedies, "Denys le tyran" (1748), "Arsitomène" (1749), "Cléopâtre" (1750), "Les Héraclides" (1752), and "Egyptus" (1753), but his success was not great as a poet. Then he turned his attention to prose, and contributed largely to the "Encyclopédie." He recast several of his articles and published them subsequently in book form, such as his "Poétique française" (1763), and his "Éléments de littérature" (1787): this latter work places him second to La Harpe only as a propagandist of literature in the 18th century. He had already acquired renown by his "Contes moraux" (1761), his philosophical novel "Bélisaire" (1767), and his historical novel "Les Incas" (1777). He published further "La Pharsale," translated from Lucan (1761), and wrote the words for several comic operas, as "Le Huron" (1768), "Zémire et Azor" (1771), "Didon" (1783), and "Pénélope" (1785). Between 1789 and 1792 he published in "Le Mercure" a second series of "Contes moraux." His posthumous works are "Mémoires d'un père à ses enfants" (1804), and "Leçons d'un père à ses enfants sur la langue française" (1806). He was elected to the French Academy in 1763. He is a truly representative disciple of Voltaire.

Maronites (mar′ō-nīts). A section of the Syrian population, settled chiefly on and around Mount Lebanon, from Tripolis in the north to Tyre and the Sea of Galilee in the south. Their number is above 200,000. They live by cattle-breeding, agriculture, and silk-culture. They form a separate ecclesiastical community, having been originally Monothelites (holding that in Christ there was only one will). Since 1182 they have been gradually united to the Roman Catholic Church, but still retain some of their special privileges, as the Syrian liturgy and marriage of the lower clergy. They also consider themselves politically a separate nation, being ruled by a Christian pasha and by sheiks chosen from their aristocracy, and only paying a tribute to the Turkish government. The name Maronites is derived from an old monastery which was situated on the Orontes (modern al-Azi) between Hamah and Emesa, and was so named after a saint who lived in the 4th century (mar meaning in Syrian 'lord,' 'master,' then 'saint'; maron, my lord). Some derive it from a village, Maronea, situated east of Antioch.

Maroons (ma-rönz′). The name formerly given in Jamaica to bands of fugitive slaves and their descendants. They formed villages in the mountains in the 17th century. Early in the 18th century they became formidable under their leader, Cudjoe, attacking plantations and openly opposing government troops. In 1738 Governor Trelawney made a treaty of peace with them, securing their freedom and granting them lands. They rebelled in 1795, were partially reduced in 1796, and many of them were sent to Nova Scotia and Sierra Leone. The last outbreak of the survivors was in 1798. The name (French nègres marrons) is sometimes applied to the bush negroes of Guiana.

Marot (mä-rō′), Clément. Born at Cahors, 1497: died at Turin, 1544. A noted French poet. He was sent to Paris at an early age to study law, but the work was not to his taste, and he soon gave it up. His father had been court poet to the Queen of France, Anne de Bretagne, and through him the son obtained access to the court circles, where he won the good will of Marguerite de Valois. When Francis I. came to the throne of France in 1515, Clément Marot attracted the king's attention by his poem "Le temple de Cupidon," and was retained by him at court. The poet followed his royal patron on his expeditions, and led on the whole an eventful life. Besides a great deal of original poetry, Marot translated portions of Vergil, Ovid, and Petrarch, also 52 psalms of David. His complete works have been variously edited: the last edition from the author's lifetime is dated 1544. His modern editors are Fresnoy (1731), Rapilly (1824), Jannet (1868–72), and Guiffrey, whose work is still (1894) in course of publication.

Marozia (ma-rō′zi-ạ). Died before 945. A Roman woman notorious for her profligacy and for the influence she exercised over the papal court. She was the daughter of the infamous Theodora and Theophylactus, became the mistress of Pope Sergius III., and married successively Alberic I., prince of Rome, her stepson Guido, and Hugo, king of Italy. She was instrumental in raising three popes to the throne, among whom was her son by Sergius, John XI. She was eventually imprisoned by her son Alberic. See Alberic II.

Marplot, or the Second Part of The Busy Body. A comedy by Mrs. Centlivre, produced in 1710. Henry Woodward altered it, and called it "Marplot in Lisbon." Martin Marplot is a silly, cowardly fellow, who spoils everything he undertakes. He differs somewhat from Mar-all in Dryden's play, and is the original of the more modern Paul Pry.

Marprelate Controversy, The. A vigorous and vituperative pamphlet war waged by the Puritans against the defenders of English Church discipline about 1589. The pamphlets were written by a number of persons, but were published under the name of Martin Marprelate. Udall was the originator of the controversy, but afterward announced his disapproval of the Martinist methods. The press which printed the tracts was moved from place to place to avoid government suppression, and was once seized, near Manchester, but the publications were continued. Penry, Barrow, Job Throckmorton, Fenner, John Field, and others have all been supposed to be the authors of the tracts, but some think Martin Marprelate to have been a layman about the court. The controversy was suppressed by the death of Udall in prison, and the execution of Penry and Barrow in 1593.

So great was the stir that a formal answer of great length was put forth by "T. C." (well known to be Thomas Cooper, Bishop of Winchester), entitled, "An Admonition to the People of England." The Martinists, from their invisible and shifting citadel, replied with perhaps the cleverest tract of the whole controversy, named, with deliberate quaintness, Hay any Work for Cooper? ("Have You any Work for the Cooper?" said to be an actual trade London cry). Thenceforward the mêlée of pamphlets, answers, "replies, duplies, quadruplies," became, in small space, indescribable. Petheram's prospectus of reprints (only partially carried out) enumerates twenty-six, almost all printed in the three years 1588–1590; Mr. Arber, including the preliminary works, counts some thirty.

2. A painting by Paolo Veronese (1563), in the Louvre, Paris. The picture measures 32 by 21 feet, and is throughout a triumph of coloring. The subject is treated as a sumptuous banquet, in a rich architectural setting. Many of the personages are portraits of sovereigns and other distinguished people of the 16th century. The musicians represent the chief Venetian painters.

3. A famous picture by Tintoret, in the sacristy of Santa Maria della Salute, Venice.

Marriage of St. Catharine. There are numerous paintings of the "Sposalizio," or Mystical Marriage of St. Catharine of Siena, thus designated. The following are the more important: (1) A masterpiece by Correggio (1519), in the Louvre, Paris. The child Christ, seated on the Virgin's knee, holds St. Catharine's ring-finger, upon which he is about to place a ring. St. Sebastian, holding his arrows, looks over St. Catharine's shoulder. (2) A painting (called the Piccolo Sposalizio in distinction from the Louvre masterpiece) by Correggio, in the Museo Nazionale, Naples. (3) A painting by Innocenzo da Imola, in San Giacomo Maggiore, Bologna, Italy. (4) A triptych by Hans Memling (1479), in the Hospital of St. John at Bruges, Belgium. The Virgin, holding the Child, sits under a portico, attended by floating angels; St. Catharine kneels, about to receive the ring. At the sides stand the two Sts. John, St. Barbara, angels, and monks. On one wing is painted the story of Salome, on the other the vision of St. John the Evangelist. (5) A painting by Murillo, in the Church of Los Capuchinos at Cadiz. While at work on this picture, in 1682, the painter fell from his scaffolding and received injuries which caused his death. (6) A painting by Rubens, in the Church of the Augustinians at Antwerp, Belgium. The Virgin is enthroned; the Child on her knee leans toward St. Catharine, extending the ring; behind are St. Joseph, several apostles and other saints, and angels. (7) A decorative painting by Paolo Veronese, in Santa Caterina at Venice. The youthful figure of the saint is especially beautiful.

Marriage of the Virgin. 1. One of the most important paintings of Perugino, in the musée at Caen, France.—2. A celebrated painting by Raphael, in the Brera at Milan. Mary and her attendant maidens stand at the spectator's left; Joseph, bearing the flowering staff, and behind him the suitors with the barren staves, face them at the right; while the venerable high priest in the middle performs his function, and a youth in the foreground breaks his dry staff across his knee. The temple occupies the background, in the form of a domical 16-sided building with an arcaded peristyle of 16 columns.

Martyrios mine (mär-tē′rē-ōs mīn). A gold-mine said to have been discovered in the interior of Brazil, in the region now embraced in northern Matto Grosso, about 1685. The knowledge of the locality, if it ever existed, was lost. Numerous expeditions were made in search of it, and these, though without the desired result, were important in other respects. Search for the mine is occasionally made even at the present day.

Martyrs, Les. [F., 'The Martyrs.'] A prose epic on the triumph of Christianity, by Châteaubriand (1809).

The unequal but remarkable prose epic of "Les Martyrs" [of Châteaubriand]. This, the story of which is laid in the time of Diocletian, shifts its scene from classical countries to Gaul, where the half-mythical heroes of the Franks appear, and then back to Greece, Rome, and Purgatory.

Marx, Karl. Born at Treves, Prussia, May 5, 1818: died at London, March 14, 1883. A German socialist. He studied jurisprudence, philosophy, and history at Bonn and Berlin, and in 1842 became editor of the "Rheinische Zeitung" at Cologne, on the suppression of which in 1843 he went to Paris, where he devoted himself to the study of sociology and political economy. He was soon expelled from France at the instance of the Prussian government, and took refuge at Brussels. On the outbreak of the revolutionary movement in Germany in 1848, he returned to Cologne, where he founded the "Neue Rheinische Zeitung." He was, however, expelled from Prussia again in 1849, and eventually settled at London, where he continued his socialistic agitation. He was the controlling spirit of the International from its foundation in 1864 to its disruption in 1872. His chief work is "Das Kapital" (1867).

Mary (mā′ri). [Heb. Miriam, Gr. Μαρία or Μαριάμ, L. Maria, F. Marie, It. Sp. Pg. G. Maria. See Miriam.] The mother of Jesus. According to the Gospel narrative, the angel Gabriel, sent from God to Mary, "a virgin espoused to a man whose name was Joseph, of the house of David," told her that she was to bring forth a son, adding the explanation that the holy thing to be born of her was to be conceived of the Holy Ghost. This "annunciation" is commemorated as a church festival on March 25, which is hence known as Lady-day. In due time she gave birth to the child Jesus in a stable at Bethlehem. Very little is told in the New Testament of Mary's personal history. The doctrine of her immaculate conception and consequent sinlessness is an article of faith in the Roman Catholic Church, promulgated Dec. 8, 1854, by a bull of Pope Pius IX. which declares that from the first instant of her conception the Blessed Virgin Mary was kept free from all taint of original sin. In that church, and in the Greek Church, she is regarded as the most exalted of created beings: while angels and saints have that secondary veneration or worship paid to them which is called "dulia," she alone is entitled to "hyperdulia," and her intercession is invoked more than that of all others. She is often called "The Virgin," and in art "The Madonna."

Mary. The sister of Martha and Lazarus, resident at Bethany.

Mary I. (Mary Tudor), called "Bloody Mary." Born at Greenwich Palace, Feb. 18, 1516: died Nov. 17, 1558. Queen of England and Ireland, only surviving child of Henry VIII. and Catharine of Aragon. She was affianced first to the dauphin in 1518, and later to Charles V. in 1522. An attempt was also made to marry her to Francis I. in 1526. At the divorce of Catharine in 1533, Mary was adjudged illegitimate, but on Feb. 7, 1544, the crown was entailed upon her after Edward or any lawful child of the king. Edward VI. died July 6, 1553, and on July 13, 1553, Mary was proclaimed queen at Norwich, and crowned at Westminster Oct. 1, 1553. The council proclaimed Lady Jane Grey queen; but Mary quickly overcame opposition. She married Philip of Spain (later Philip II.) at Winchester, July 25, 1554. An insurrection headed by the Duke of Suffolk in favor of his daughter, Lady Jane Grey, and one of Kentishmen led by Sir Thomas Wyatt were suppressed early in this year. In 1555 Parliament restored the papal power, and revived the penal laws against heresy. The first martyr was burned at Smithfield, Feb. 4, 1555. After 1556 her principal adviser was Cardinal Pole. (See Pole, Reginald.) On Nov. 10, 1558, the last heretics were burned at Canterbury, the total number of martyrs during her reign being 300.

Mary II. Born at St. James's Palace, April 30, 1662: died at Kensington Palace, Dec. 28, 1694. Queen of England, Scotland, and Ireland, eldest child of James II. By the death of her younger brother, Edgar, in 1671, she became heiress presumptive to the crown, and on Nov. 4, 1677, married William, prince of Orange. In the struggle with James II. she identified herself with her husband. On Dec. 22, 1688, James II. fled to France, and on Feb. 13, 1689, William and Mary assented to the "Declaration of Right," and were crowned joint sovereigns. She took little interest in public business, and in the king's absence ruled through the council.

Mary Queen of Scots (Mary Stuart). Born in Linlithgow Palace, Dec. 7 (8?), 1542: beheaded at Fotheringay, Feb. 8, 1587. Third child and only daughter of James V. of Scotland and Mary of Guise. By the death of James (Dec. 14, 1542) she became queen, and was crowned at Stirling Castle Sept. 9, 1543. On July 7, 1548, a marriage with the dauphin (Francis II.) was agreed upon. She was sent to Saint-Germains on Oct. 11, and educated with the royal children of France. They were married at Notre Dame April 24, 1558. At the death of Mary Tudor (see Mary I.) on Nov. 17, 1558, Mary Stuart laid claim to the English throne, as great-granddaughter of Henry VII., on the ground of Elizabeth's illegitimacy. Francis II. succeeded Henry II. of France on July 10, 1559, and the union of the three kingdoms seemed probable: but he died Dec. 5, 1560. On Aug. 19, 1561, Mary landed at Leith. Her scheme for a marriage with Don Carlos of Spain having been thwarted, on July 29, 1565, she married Lord Darnley, son of Lady Margaret Douglas, next heir after Mary to the English throne. She labored assiduously to restore the Roman Catholic faith in her kingdom, and to establish an absolute royal authority. Her refusal to grant Darnley the crown matrimonial, and his part in the murder of Rizzio, created an estrangement which terminated in the murder of Darnley with her consent Feb. 10, 1567. She married Bothwell, the murderer of Darnley, May 15, 1567; was seized by the lords, June 15, 1567, and imprisoned in Lochleven Castle; and was compelled to abdicate in favor of her son (James VI.) in July. She escaped May 2, 1568; was defeated at the battle of Langside May 13, 1568; and fled to England. Elizabeth confined her first at Carlisle, and then in various other castles. She was removed to Fotheringay Sept. 25, 1586; tried Oct. 14–15 on the charge of conspiring against the life of Elizabeth; and beheaded Feb. 8, 1587.

Mary of Burgundy. Born at Brussels, Feb. 13, 1457: died at Brussels, March 27, 1482. Daughter of Charles the Bold. She married Maximilian (later German emperor) in 1477.

Mary of Egypt, Saint. A half-mythical African saint whose history is founded on that of a female anchoret who lived and died in a desert near the river Jordan in Palestine: she bewailed her sins there for many years, and was accidentally discovered. This is a very ancient tradition, and is supported by contemporary evidence. Many picturesque and miraculous additions have been made to her story, which in its present form is attributed to St. Jerome. She is said by him to have lived in Alexandria about the year 365, and to have far exceeded Mary Magdalene, with whom she is frequently confounded, in the infamy of her early life: they are sometimes united in pictures as joint emblems of female penitence. Mary of Egypt is distinguished by three loaves which she took to the desert with her when she repented of her sins. The earliest pictures of her are thought to be in a series on the wall of the chapel of the Bargello, Florence, and there is a celebrated picture of her by Tintoretto at the Scuola di San Rocco, Venice.

St. Mary of Egypt was early a popular saint in France, and particularly venerated by the Parisians, till eclipsed by the increasing celebrity of the Magdalene. She was styled, familiarly, La Gipsienne (the Gipsy), softened by time into La Jussienne. The street in which stood a convent of reformed women dedicated to her is still la Rue Jussienne. We find her whole story in one of the richly painted windows of the cathedral of Chartres; and again in the "Vitraux de Bourges," where the inscription underneath is written "Segiptiaca."

Mrs. Jameson, Sacred and Legendary Art, I. 389.

Mary of France. Born about March, 1496: died at Westhorpe, Dec. 24, 1533. The third daughter of Henry VII. of England. On Oct. 9, 1514, she married Louis XII. of France, who died Jan. 1, 1515. She soon after married Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk: their daughter Frances was the mother of Lady Jane Grey.

Mary of Guise, or of Lorraine. Born at Barle-Duc, Nov. 22, 1515: died at Edinburgh, June 10, 1560. Queen of James V. of Scotland, and mother of Mary Queen of Scots: the eldest daughter of Claude, duke of Guise. On Aug. 4, 1534, she married Louis of Orléans, who died June 9, 1537. She married James V. of Scotland in June, 1538, and Mary Stuart was born Dec. 7 (8?), 1542. James V. died Dec. 14, 1542. On April 12, 1554, Mary was made regent of Scotland. In March, 1559, Henry II. of France sent her instructions to suppress heresy in Scotland. A conflict with Knox and the Reformers resulted in her suspension from the regency Oct. 21, 1559.

Mary of Modena. Born at Modena, Oct. 5, 1658: died at Saint-Germain, France, May 7, 1718. Queen of James II. of England, the only daughter of Alfonso IV. of Modena (Este). Her marriage with the Duke of York (James II.) was concluded at Dover, Nov. 21, 1673. The Prince of Wales (see Stuart, James Francis Edward) was born June 10, 1688 (O. S.). Her previous children had died in infancy, and rumors of substitution were immediately credited. On the invasion of England by William of Orange, she joined James II. at Saint-Germain.

Maryland (mer'i-land). [Named in honor of Henrietta Maria, wife of Charles I.] One of the thirteen original States of the United States of America, comprised (according to the common classification) in the Southern States. Capital, Annapolis; chief city, Baltimore. It is bounded by Pennsylvania on the north, Delaware and the Atlantic on the east, Chesapeake Bay on the south, Virginia and West Virginia (separated by the Potomac) on the south and west, and West Virginia on the west. It extends from lat. 37° 53′ to 39° 43′ N., and from long. 75° 4′ to 79° 33′ W. The boundaries on the south and west are very irregular. It is divided into two parts (the eastern called the Eastern Shore) by Chesapeake Bay. It is mountainous in the west. The chief agricultural products are tobacco, Indian corn, and wheat; the leading manufactures are iron and steel, and cotton. It is noted for the production of oysters. It contains 24 counties, sends 2 senators and 6 representatives to Congress, and has 8 electoral votes. Maryland was formerly a proprietary colony under the Baltimore family (patent issued 1632; colony established at St. Mary's 1634). It had serious disputes with Claiborne in the 17th century; was noted for its religious tolerance; was governed as a royal province 1691–1716; had a boundary dispute with Pennsylvania which was settled by the establishment of "Mason and Dixon's line" in 1767; ratified the United States Constitution in 1788; was plundered by the British in 1813 and 1814; was one of the slave States; and was the scene of the battle of Antietam, and of various other engagements in the Civil War. Massorah (mäs-sō′rä). [Heb., 'tradition.'] The name given to the work of the Jewish scholars in establishing the traditional pronunciation and accents of the Hebrew Old Testament. The men who were engaged in this work were called Massoretes. The work of the Massorah went on for centuries, beginning soon after the return from the Babylonian captivity, when the study of the law became the center of the life of the Jews. Of later Massoretes the most prominent were the family of Asher, called ben Asher, who flourished in the 8th to the 10th centuries A. D. The last of the family, Aaron ben Moses ben Asher (see Aaron ben Asher), in the 10th century brought the Massorah to a close. Their rivals and opponents with regard to the vocalization of the text, originally merely consonantal, were the family of Ben Naftali in Babylonia. The system of the ben Asher has prevailed. The Massoretes worked with the minutest care and conscientiousness. Their observations they either noted on the margin of the text (Masora marginalis, which is distinguished as magna and parva) or in separate works. Where the traditional reading of a passage seemed to them untenable, they added their emendation on the margin, as "that which is to be read" (qrê), opposed to "that which is written" (kethîb).

On June 17, 1128, she married Geoffrey Plantagenet, son of the Count of Anjou. Their first child (Henry II.) was born March 5, 1133. On the death of Henry I. (Dec. 1, 1135) her cousin Stephen assumed the crown. On Sept. 30, 1139, she invaded England, captured Stephen (Feb., 1141), was acknowledged lady of England and Normandy (April 8, 1141), and established herself at Westminster. She misused her power, was driven from the city, and fled to Oxford. She returned to Normandy in 1148. After the accession of her son Henry Plantagenet, she settled at Notre Dame des Prés, near Rouen, where she died. Her most noted exploit was her escape from Oxford with three of her knights at Christmas time. They clothed themselves in white, and fled over the frozen river and through Stephen's camp.

Maui (mou'ē). A hero in New Zealand legend. See the extract.

Though all these mythical beings are in a sense departmental gods, they yield in renown to a later child of their race, Maui, the great culture-hero, who is an advanced form of the culture-heroes, mainly theriomorphic, of the lower races. Maui, like many heroes of myth, was a youngest son. He was prematurely born (a similar story comes in the Brahmanic legend of the Adityas); his mother wrapped him up in her long hair, and threw him out to sea. A kinsman rescued him, and he grew up to be much the most important member of his family; like Qat in his larger circle of brethren. Maui it was who snared the sun, beat him, and taught him to run his appointed course, instead of careering at will and at any pace he chose about the heavens. He was the culture-hero who invented barbs for spears and hooks; he turned his brother into the first dog, whence dogs are sacred; he fished New Zealand out of the sea; he stole fire for men. How Maui performed this feat, and how he "brought death into the world and all our woe," are topics that belong to the myths of Death and of the Fire-Stealer. Maui could not only change men into animals, but could himself assume animal shapes at will. Lang, Myth, etc., II. 30.

Maximianus (mak′sim-i-ā′nus), Marcus Aurelius Valerius, surnamed Herculius. Died in Feb., 310. Roman emperor 286–305 and 306–308. He was a Pannonian peasant by birth, rose to the highest offices in the army, and was made Cæsar by Diocletian in 285 and Augustus in 286. (See Diocletian.) He resigned the imperial dignity simultaneously with Diocletian in 305, but reassumed it in 306 at the instance of his son Maxentius, who had caused himself to be proclaimed Cæsar by the pretorians at Rome. He captured Severus (who commanded in Italy and Africa) in 307, but was himself expelled from Rome by Maxentius in 308, and eventually found refuge with his son-in-law Constantine at Arles. Having been twice discovered in conspiracy against his son-in-law, he was ordered to choose the manner of his death, and strangled himself.

Maximilian (mak-si-mil′i-an; G. pron. mäks-ē- mē′lē-än) I. [ML. Maximilianus (=Maxi[mus Æ]milianus), F. Maximilien.] Born March 22, 1459: died at Wels, Upper Austria, Jan. 12, 1519. Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire 1493–1519, son of Frederick III. He married Mary, daughter and heiress of Charles the Bold of Burgundy, in 1477, and was elected king of the Romans in 1486. He became emperor in 1493. In order to suppress the system of private war and restore the imperial authority, he proclaimed a perpetual public peace in 1495; established the imperial chamber (Reichskammergericht) in 1495, and the imperial aulic council (Reichshofrat) in 1501; and divided Germany into six, and afterward (1512) into ten, circles (Landfriedenskreise), over each of which was placed a captain with a force of standing troops for the punishment of disturbers of the peace. In 1499 he carried on an unsuccessful war against the Swiss Confederacy, which resulted in the practical independence of the latter. Through the influence of his second wife, Bianca Sforza, daughter of the Duke of Milan, whom he married in 1494, he became involved in a contest with France for the sovereignty of Milan and Naples. In 1508 he joined the League of Cambray against Venice. In 1513 he joined the Holy League against France; and in the same year assisted Henry VIII. of England in gaining the brilliant victory over the French at Guinegate ("the battle of the spurs").

Maximilian II. Born at Vienna, Aug. 1, 1527: died Oct. 12, 1576. Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire 1564–76, son of Ferdinand I. He succeeded his father in 1564 as emperor, archduke of Austria, and king of Hungary and Bohemia. At his accession to the imperial throne he found the empire at war with the Turks. He concluded a truce with Selim II. in 1568, each party retaining its possessions. He was of a mild and tolerant disposition, and left the Protestants undisturbed in the exercise of their religion.

Maximilian I. Born at Landshut, Bavaria, April 17, 1573: died at Ingolstadt, Bavaria, Sept. 27, 1651. Duke of Bavaria. He was the chief instrument in organizing the Catholic League in opposition to the Protestant Union in 1600. As the head of the Catholic League, he assisted the emperor Ferdinand II. against the elector palatine Frederick V. in the Thirty Years' War (see Ferdinand II., Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire). In return for which he received in 1623 the electoral vote forfeited by Frederick, and in 1628 was invested with the Upper Palatinate.

Maximilian I. Joseph. Born at Schwetzingen, Baden, May 27, 1756: died at the castle of Nymphenburg, near Munich, Oct. 13, 1825. King of Bavaria 1806–25. He became elector of Bavaria in 1799. In 1805 he sided with France against the allied powers, with the result that he acquired considerable territory at the peace of Presburg, Dec. 26, 1805. In accordance with the same treaty, he assumed the title of king in 1806.

Maximilian II. Joseph. Born Nov. 28, 1811: died at Munich, March 10, 1864. King of Bavaria 1848–64, son of Louis I. He was a liberal patron of art and literature.

Maximilian (Ferdinand Maximilian Joseph), Sp. Maximiliano (mäk-sē-mē-lē-ä′nō). Born at Vienna, July 6, 1832: shot at Querétaro, Mexico, June 19, 1867. Archduke of Austria, and emperor of Mexico from 1864. He was the second son of the Archduke Francis Charles, and brother of Francis Joseph who became emperor of Austria in 1848. Trained for the navy, he was placed at its head in 1854. On July 27, 1857, he married Princess Charlotte of Belgium (see Charlotte), and during the succeeding two years was viceroy of the Lombard-Venetian kingdom. After the French had conquered Mexico in part, an assembly of notables, called under French influence, and formed almost entirely of opponents of Juarez, adopted an imperial form of government for that country (July, 1863), and offered the throne to Maximilian. He formally accepted on April 10, 1864; reached Vera Cruz May 28, and Mexico June 12; and was received with great apparent enthusiasm. Aided by the French, his forces drove Juarez over the northern frontier, and on Oct. 3, 1865, he decreed that those taken in arms against the empire should be treated as bandits. This decree was loudly condemned, and did much to weaken the emperor's personal popularity. The United States government had refused to recognize the empire, and on its urgent demand (note of Feb. 12, 1866) the French troops were withdrawn, contrary to the express stipulation which Napoleon III. had made with Maximilian. The latter at first resolved to resign, but was induced to remain; took personal command of his army at Querétaro, Feb., 1867; was besieged by a republican army in March; and was forced to surrender May 15. Condemned to death by a court martial, he was refused mercy on the ground of his severe edict against the Juarists, and was shot with his generals Miramon and Mejía.

Maxyes (maks'i-ēz). [Gr. Μάξυες.] In ancient geography, a Libyan tribe.

About the Mashuash [of the Egyptian inscriptions] there is no dispute. They are the Maxyes of Herodotos (iv. 191), in the modern Tunisia, of whom we are told that they left a long lock of hair on the right side of the head and painted their bodies red. We learn from the Egyptian texts that while the Lebu were circumcised, the Mashuash were not. The lock of hair which characterises them on the Egyptian monuments is also wanting in the case of the Lebu. But, like the Lebu, they have a good deal of hair on the face, the eyebrows are well defined, and the nose is straight and leptorrhine. The forehead is high, the lips thin, and the jaws orthognathous.

Mayaguez (mī-ä-gwäth'). A seaport in Porto Rico, West Indies, situated in lat. 18° 14′ N., long. 67° 12′ W. Population, about 22,000.

Mayapan (mī-yä-pän'). A ruined city of Yucatan, situated in a plain 20 miles south of Merida. According to tradition it was founded by Maya Indians about 1150; was long their principal city and capital; and was destroyed or abandoned during civil wars about 1420. The remains include great quantities of sculptured stones, and several pyramids, one well preserved. Mayapan gave its name to a district.

Mayas (mī'äz or mä'yäz). A race of Indians inhabiting the peninsula of Yucatan, Mexico. At the time of the conquest they were divided into a number of tribes (Acalans, Tipuans, Cocames, Itzaecs, etc.), which were often at war with one another. Their principal cities were well built, in part of stone; they had written (hieroglyphic) records, and preserved legends of former greatness during a period when all Yucatan or Maya was governed by a single ruler, who lived at Mayapan. The Mayas were idolators, but appear to have believed in a supreme deity whom they called Hunab-ku. Crimes were severely punished. Several of the tribes resisted the Spaniards bravely, and some of those in the interior and south have never been entirely subdued. Descendants of the conquered Indians form the great bulk of the population of Yucatan, and the Maya language is still commonly used in country districts. Under some of their chiefs they rebelled (1847–53), and for a short time held possession of a great part of the peninsula. See Maya stock.

Maya (mī'ä or mä'yä) stock. A well-marked linguistic group of American Indians, in southeastern Mexico and Central America. It includes among others the Mayas of Yucatan, the Tzendals and Chinantecs of Chiapas, the Cakchiquels, Ixils, Mames, and Quichés of Guatemala, and the outlying Huastecs to the north of Vera Cruz. Traces of the stock are found in Honduras. Among American races the Mayas ranked with the Aztecs in advancement, and in many respects were their superiors. They excelled in sculptured building, in weaving (cotton), feather-work, etc.; they dwelt in populous cities (Chichen Itza, Peten, Uxmal, etc.), and had almost certainly built the older towns of Copan, Palenque, and others, which were in ruins when the Spaniards arrived. Many of their strongholds, especially in Guatemala, were chosen and fortified with great skill, and the Spaniards took them only after long sieges. Chieftainship was generally hereditary; the laws were often complex and severe. The Maya calendar resembled that of the Nahuatl tribes, and there was also some resemblance in their complicated mythology. The Mayas, Quichés, Cakchiquels, and others had pictographic records painted on prepared bark or sculptured: a few of these have survived in translations, but the original pictographs have baffled modern research. The records and traditions appear to show that the Maya races were formerly united and very powerful; back of that they go vaguely to a remote period, possibly to the beginning of the Christian era, and speak of a migration from the north. Many writers believe that this connects them with the ancient Toltecs, said to have occupied the highlands of Mexico. Brasseur de Bourbourg and others have formed ingenious theories on Maya history, which have not been generally accepted.

Maybole (mā'bōl). A town in Ayrshire, Scotland, 39 miles south-southwest of Glasgow. Population (1891), 5,467.

May-day (mā'dā). The first day of May: a day on which the opening of the season of flowers and fruit was formerly celebrated throughout Europe: it is still marked in some places by various festive observances. He was descended from a noble Sicilian family, studied at a Jesuit college at Rome and at the University of Alcalá, and in 1622 entered the papal military service. He was afterward employed in various diplomatic missions, and attracted the notice of Richelieu, at whose instance he entered the French service. He became a naturalized Frenchman in 1639, and was made a cardinal by the Popeon the presentation of Louis XIII., although he had never taken any monastic or minor orders. He was appointed prime minister on the death of Richelieu in 1642, and was retained in office by the queen regent, Anne of Austria, after the death of Louis XIII. in 1643. He continued the foreign policy of Richelieu, which looked to the abatement of the power of the house of Austria by interfering in favor of the Protestants in the Thirty Years' War, and which resulted in complete success at the peace of Westphalia in 1648. At home his policy of centralizing all administrative authority in the crown — also a legacy from Richelieu — was opposed by the nobles and the Parliament of Paris, and gave rise to the wars of the Fronde (which see), during which he was twice expelled by his opponents from the court (1651–52 and 1652–53). In 1659 he concluded the peace of the Pyrenees, putting an end to the hostilities with Spain which had sprung up during the Thirty Years' War, and securing an increase of French territory.

He was elected senator in 1886, and again in 1891 at the head of the list of four. Among his works are "Les gouvernements de la France du XVIIe au XIXe siècle" (1864), "La république des États Unis, etc." (1869), "La fin de la révolution, etc." (1872), "La lutte contre la misère" (1883), "Les généraux de la république" (1889), etc.

Mazeppa (mä-zep′ä), Ivan. Born 1644: died at Bender, 1709. A Cossack chief. He was descended from a poor but noble family at Mazepintzui in the palatinate of Podolia, and was educated as a page at the court of John Casimir, king of Poland. Having been detected in an intrigue with a Polish lady of high rank, he was by order of the injured husband bound naked on the back of an untamed horse from the Ukraine. The horse on being let loose galloped off to its native haunts, where it was caught by some Cossack peasants. Mazeppa remained among the Cossacks, whose hetman or chief he became in 1687. He enjoyed the favor of Peter the Great, who gave him the title of Prince of the Ukraine. With a view to making himself independent of Russia, he conspired first with Stanislaus Leszczynski of Poland, and afterward with Charles XII. of Sweden. Besieged by the Russians in his capital Baturin, he escaped to the camp of Charles XII., whom he accompanied to Bender after the battle of Fultowa. He committed suicide by taking poison. Lord Byron made him the subject of a poem in 1819.

He graduated at the University of Genoa in 1826, became a member of the bar of that city, and joined the Carbonari. In 1830 he was arrested by the authorities of Piedmont on the charge of conspiring against the government, but after an imprisonment of six months was released for want of sufficient evidence to procure a conviction. He thereupon left Italy and resided successively at Marseilles, Paris, and London, whence he conducted agitations for the liberation of Italy. He founded about 1832 the secret revolutionary society of "Young Italy," whose object was the unification of Italy under a republican government. He returned to Italy at the outbreak of the revolutionary movements of 1848, and in 1849 became a member of the triumvirate in the short-lived republic at Rome, being again driven into exile on the restoration of the papal government (1849). He afterward organized insurrections in Mantua (1852), Milan (1853), and Genoa (1857), but played a subordinate part in the movement which resulted in the unification of Italy (except Venice and the Patrimonium Petri) under Victor Emmanuel in 1861. Unwilling to take the oath of allegiance to a monarchy, he remained abroad. In 1870 he took part in an insurrection at Palermo, during which he was captured. He was, however, released by the general amnesty published by the Italian government after the occupation of Rome.

Medea (mē-dē′ă). [Gr. Μήδεια.] In Greek legend, a sorceress, daughter of Æetes, king of the Colchians, and wife of Jason. When Jason came with the Argonauts (see Jason) to obtain the Golden Fleece, Medea aided him by her magic arts, and escaped with him to Corinth, where, ten years later, she murdered Creusa or Glauce, daughter of King Creon, for whom Jason had determined to abandon her. From Corinth she fled to Athens, and married Ægeus (father of Theseus), by whom she had a son, Medus, regarded by the Greeks as the ancestor of the Medes. Having plotted against the life of Theseus, she was obliged to flee, and finally returned to Colchis.

Medea. 1. A play by Euripides. See the extract.

The "Medea" came out in 431 B. C. along with the poet's "Philoctetes," "Dictys," and the satyric "Reapers" (the last was early lost). It was based upon a play of Neophron's, and only obtained the third prize, Euphorion being first and Sophocles second. It may according regarded as a failure in its day — an opinion appar confirmed by the faults (viz., Ægeus and the wi chariot) selected from it as specimens in Aristotle's etic." There is considerable evidence of there being ond edition of the play, and many of the variant so-called interpolations, seem to arise from both ver being preserved and confused. Nevertheless, there no play of Euripides more praised and imitated by Romans and moderns.

Medina (me-dē′nä), Ar. Medinat-Rasul-Allah (me-dē′nät-rä-sōl′äl′lä), or Medinat-el-Rabi (me-dē′nät-el-rä′bē). A city in Hedjaz, Arabia, the second holy city of the Mohammedans, situated about lat. 24° 30′ N., long. 40° E.: the ancient Yathrib, called by Ptolemy Lathrippa. It is celebrated as the place where Mohammed took refuge at the flight (622 A. D.) (see Hejira), and where he died and was buried. From this it is sometimes designated "the city of the prophet." The Great Mosque contains Mohammed's tomb. The inclosure measures about 500 by 390 feet, and as usual is surrounded by arcaded galleries. The tomb is in an inclosure in the southeastern corner, beneath a conspicuous pointed dome: the pavement of this part of the mosque is formed of beautiful mosaics. The tomb consists of a structure of black stones, with two pillars: it is wholly concealed from the eyes of the profane by precious draperies. The actual buildings of the mosque are at least in large part very modern, the arches, though of pointed horseshoe-form, not being extradosed, while the columns are pseudo-classical. Medina was the capital of the Mohammedan empire down to the accession of the Ommiads (661). Population, estimated, 16,000.

Medina (mē-dī′nä). In Spenser's "Faerie Queene," the second of the three sisters Elissa, Medina, and Perissa. She far excelled the other two, representing the golden mean, while Elissa was froward and always discontented, and Perissa was loose and extravagant, and indulgent in all pleasures.

Medinat-ez-Zahra (me-dē′nät-ez-zä′rä). See the extract.

> One of his [the calif's] wives, whose name was Ez-Zahra, 'the Fairest,' to whom he was devotedly attached, once begged him to build her a city which should be called after her name. The Great Khalif, like most Mohammedan sovereigns, delighted in building, and he adopted the suggestion. He at once began to found a city at the foot of the mountain called the "Hill of the Bride," over against Cordova, and a few miles distant. Every year he spent a third of his revenues upon this building; and it went on all the twenty-five remaining years of his reign, and fifteen years of the reign of his son, who made many additions to it. Ten thousand workmen laboured daily at the task, and six thousand blocks of stone were cut and polished every day for the construction of the houses of the new city. Some three thousand beasts of burden were daily used to carry the materials to the spot, and four thousand columns were set up, many of which were presents from the Emperor of Constantinople, or came from Rome, Carthage, Sfax, and other places, besides the home marbles quarried at Tarragona and Almeria. There were fifteen thousand doors, coated with iron or polished brass. The Hall of the Khalifs at the new city had a roof and walls of marble and gold, and in it was a wonderful sculptured fountain, a present from the Greek Emperor, who also sent the Khalif a unique pearl. In the midst of the hall was a basin of quicksilver; at either side were eight doors set in ivory and ebony and adorned with precious stones. When the sun shone through these doors and the quicksilver lake was set quivering, the whole room was filled with flashes like lightning, and the courtiers would cover their dazzled eyes. The Arabian authors delight in telling of the wonders of this "City of the Fairest," Medinat-ez-Zahra, as it was called, after the Khalif's mistress.

Medinet-Abu (me-dē′net-ä-bō′) or -Habu (-hä-bō′). One of the villages on the site of Thebes, Egypt, noted for its ruins. The temple and palace of Rameses III. here are notable. The front buildings, facing the south, constitute the royal palace. Many of the very interesting mural sculptures reproduce the private life of the king. From the palace a dromos 265 feet long leads to the massive outer pylon of the temple, which opens on a court over 100 feet square with Osirid figures on the north side and columns with bell-capitals on the south. A second pylon with portal between pyramidal towers leads to an imposing court 123 by 133 feet, surrounded by a peristyle having Osirid figures in front and rear and columns on the sides. Behind the rear figures is a range of 8 splendid columns with colored cœlanaglyphic sculptures. The portal of this court gives access to the hypostyle hall, bordered with chambers, behind which two columned vestibules precede the sanctuary and a labyrinth of corridors and small chambers. The sculptures of this temple are of great importance. They include in the interior ceremonial scenes of the cult, the king's coronation, and battle-scenes, many of them very richly colored. The exterior of the temple is covered with sculptures which are even more remarkable, illustrating Rameses's campaigns against the Libyans and an Asiatic people. Among the scenes a naval battle is of especial interest.

The "tomb of Hiram" has been already described. Four monuments of a more or less similar character exist on the Syrian mainland opposite Aradus, in the near vicinity of Amrit. Two are known as "the Méghâzils." They stand near together on a low hill, at some little distance from the coast, between the Nahr Amrit and the Nahr Kublé. The more striking of the two has been described as a "real masterpiece in respect of proportion, elegance, and majesty." It consists of a basement story, which is circular and flanked by four stone lions, whereof the effect is admirable, with a second story of a cylindrical shape, and a third similar one, of smaller dimensions, crowned by a dome or half-sphere. The whole, except the basement-story or plinth, which consists of four blocks, is cut out of a single stone. The double cylinder is decorated round the summit of each of its parts with a row of carved crenellations standing out about four inches from the general surface. The lions, whose heads and fore-quarters alone project from the mass of the base, are roughly carved and seem to have been left unfinished, but the mouldings, and the general dressing of the stone, have been executed with much care. The entire height of the monument is thirty-two feet. Rawlinson, Phœnicia, p. 260.
